The third reason offered in favor of a time limit, the fear of Government ownership, is born of a superficial view of the subject, which confuses Federal control with Government ownership. Federal control is not Government ownership at all. On the contrary, it is the very method that can save us from Government ownership. Private control and ownership has already proven a failure. Some way must be found to cure the defects of the system, or Government ownership inevitably follows. If, after a trial of Federal control, the roads break down utterly under existing conditions, then the Government, to save its own life, must own its own means of life—the railroads—as well as control them. Now, the Government as a war necessity has taken control and has coordinated all the roads under one head and for one purpose, namely, service. It is a concentration of control that was so dearly sought by the great railroad magnates of the past, but the people would not trust such power in private hands. The thing sought for by these railroad magnates for 50 years past was gained by a stroke of the pen by the President for the people. If the policy of consolidating the roads under a central head was economically correct when it was proposed to place the control in the hands of a coterie of Wall Street speculators, why will it not still be a wise and economic policy when the control is placed in the impartial hands of a Federal director, where the rights of the people and of the roads will both be jealously guarded?

If the gentlemen who are haunted by the ghost of Government ownership prevent an honest demonstration of Federal control, to see whether or not the troubles of private ownership can be cured and the railroads made to do the work of the country, then they will have to face a country-wide demand for not only Federal control but Federal ownership as well, with nearly 2,000,000 employees added to the civil-service rolls of the country, with all the possible dangers of such a gigantic civil roll influencing legislation.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I do.

Mr. FESS. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion, without embarrassing him. Believing myself that this step will almost certainly lead to Government ownership, I would like to ask him whether the fixing of the time limit will prevent it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. My idea is that the moment you fix the time limit you make it absolutely necessary for the Congress of the United States to act before that time limit expires, and if the people are not then ready to act, if the Congress is not ready to act, if we are all undecided as to what the policy should be, then these roads automatically go back; and if they go back under such a chaotic condition as will exist at that time you can rest assured that private ownership will be spurned by the people and Congress will be compelled to take over these railroads as Government property and operate them. Now, if no time limit is fixed, then everything will go on; and we will demonstrate beyond a question of doubt whether or not Federal control is a success. If it is not a success, none of us want it. If it is a success, we all want it. That is my view of it.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, I have always feared Government ownership and am very much opposed to it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. But I think I can see it definitely coming. That is my opinion under the conditions that are in operation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. There is certainly danger of it. Referring again to this large civil pay roll, my fear would be that such a force in a position to profit through the pay-roll route by legislation which they could tremendously influence, the very life of the Government might be endangered. I can readily see that we might cease to be a Government by the people and for the people, and become instead a Government by the employees for the employees. Yet if compelled to choose between being exploited by a gang of railroad speculators and being more or less pulled about by a vast body of Government employees, I would choose the latter.

The gentlemen who insist upon writing a limitation of Federal control in section 14 of this bill merely hasten the day for Government ownership in the fullest sense of the word with all the possible evils thereof, because, whether they know it or not, private control has broken down and the country knows it. A few years more of such control and no one will be left, except widows and orphans and the helpless generally, who can be induced to invest in railroad stocks and bonds. Something must be done now before the roads ever leave the control of the Federal Government to safeguard the investments in railroad stocks and bonds and stabilize values so the public will have unquestioned confidence in them. If this is not done, extensions and betterments are impossible. An adequate service can never be secured with the Wall Street wrecking crew in charge of so many of the roads.

By amending section 14 by striking out the two-year limit Federal control will be continued until such time as protective legislation can be enacted. Personally I am convinced beyond a doubt that the solution of our whole trouble and escape from Government ownership and the evils that might follow lies in Federal control along the lines we have now adopted as a war measure only. If it proves a success, no one would want to go back to the private control; and if it is a failure, we will have eliminated Federal control from further consideration. That question then will have been as completely eliminated as is private control in the minds of the people at this moment.

Therefore if the present method of Federal control under the Director General proves a failure, we would be face to face with Government ownership. To insert in this bill a day for the return of the roads to their corporate owners, to the old system of private control that has failed in the past, is to issue a clarion call to the country to stop the outrage before it can be perpetrated, and the country will undoubtedly stop it by forcing us into Government ownership. Is it not, then, absurd to write a limit in this bill making it impossible to give Federal control a thorough test before we are compelled to prematurely turn them back into the field of speculation and ruin or take them over as Government property and own as well as operate them?

GHOST OF GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP KILLED SHIP BILL.

The fear of Government ownership talked the shipping bill to death in March, 1915, or the threat of it brought the same result. As a result our shipbuilding program was set back two whole years. The eminent legislators who permitted themselves to be frightened by the ghost of Government ownership I charge with the responsibility of having failed to provide the country with ships that are to-day so sadly needed to carry our troops and supplies to Europe. If our shipping program had been begun two years sooner, as that bill provided, we would now be able to place one and one-half million soldiers in Europe and feed them with ease. The ghost of Government ownership stalking timid legislators did the work. These same gentlemen, too, are now loudest in their criticism of the War Department because it is unable to equip and place an army in Europe without an adequate amount of shipping. There was also a substantial backer to the Government ownership ghost that stayed in the background. It dangled the ghost out where everybody could see. The backer of the ghost was the Shipping Trust. They had a gold mine operating ships at a freight rate 1,000 per cent above the rates of peace times. They could see absolutely no sense in the Government building ships to compete with them, so they shouted Government ownership, and their reactionary friends responded everywhere and the Government ship bill was killed and not a move made for two years after the bill was introduced in September, 1914, to save the country from extortionate freight rates. These gentlemen may escape the responsibility of their exceedingly great mistake, but they nevertheless have it on their souls just the same. The country is without necessary ships now, and they should not escape the blame. This House did its full duty in backing up the administration's program for shipping tonnage and every other measure necessary to win this war.

The fear of Government ownership put a limitation of one year in the war-risk insurance law, which makes it necessary for us to renew this measure every year. If something should happen, if Congress should not be in session or a deadlock of some kind should occur, making it impossible to renew this measure, then the ships of commerce would not be able to leave our harbors for want of insurance. Yet we had to put it in to satisfy these gentlemen who were constantly shivering around for fear Government ownership will be fixed upon the country. They can not conceive of the people having sense enough after they have tried a thing to conclude whether or not it has been a success or a failure. If it proves to be a success, of course they will want to continue it; if it is a failure, certainly they will want to discontinue it. Therefore there can be no object whatever in hampering legislation with provisions of this sort, lest it will in a measure contribute for or against Government ownership.

FEDERAL CONTROL SHOULD EXTEND OVER PERIOD OF PEACE.

There is another phase of the subject also that should be considered, and that is the very great desirability of having Federal control extend over a period of peace, so that a demonstration can be had of its feasibility as a permanent policy. If Federal control is concluded immediately after the war, there will be no opportunity to test the value of this method of handling the railroad situation. The truth is, some 5 or 10 years should be allowed for this period of demonstration for the purpose of satisfying the country beyond a question of doubt that Federal control is or is not practicable. The country is certain that the management of the railroads under private control has been a failure, and they are seeking and demanding some satisfactory solution of this problem.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I take it from the gentleman's remarks that he is in favor of Government ownership of railroads and would have established it years ago.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. The gentleman has no right to make any such assumption, because I have stated three or four times in the course of my remarks that I am opposed to Government ownership, excepting as a very last resort.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I did misunderstand the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But since the gentleman refers to what might have been done, I might ask him whether he agrees with that other distinguished Nebraskan who was in favor of Government ownership of the railroads years ago, but who did not get very far with his program?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Do you want to know whether I am in favor of him?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Whether you stand with him; yes?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I certainly would not stand with him if he is for Government ownership and I am against it, but I do not think the gentleman from Nebraska, whom you refer to, favors Government ownership. He never did favor Government ownership. He has always stood on the subject about as I have just outlined it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want the gentleman to misunderstand me, but I have a distinct recollection that the Nebraska Commoner initiated a policy of Government ownership of railroads.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. That is a mistake. I heard Mr. Bryan make his so-called Government-ownership speech in Madison Square Garden, and it was not a Government-ownership speech at all, but he made the statement in effect that I have just made.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But does not the gentleman think the other distinguished Nebraskan would really be vindicated by the passage of this bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Which other distinguished Nebraskan?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. William Jennings Bryan, the great Commoner.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. William Jennings Bryan, the great Commoner, is in substantial accord with this proposition, I think.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did not Mr. Bryan in 1908, in Madison Square Garden, announce a platform substantially as set forth in this bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I think the gentleman is correct. I think the substance of my remarks are in accord with his statements on that occasion.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to see if we were not vindicating Mr. Bryan by the passage of this bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Oh, he has been vindicated a thousand times. [Laughter.]

If a day is fixed for the return of these roads to their owners, on that day the roads must go back no matter what the conditions are that may exist at that time. While, on the other hand, if the day is not set, there will be an opportunity for consideration of the question from every angle in the light of the experience gained by Federal control of these roads in time of peace.

During the last 10 years scores of railroads have been wrecked through mismanagement and speculation. The operation of these particular roads has been solely in the interest of those who wished to make money out of them, and with only an incidental regard to the rendition of service to the people. The result has been the ruin of hundreds of thousands of stockholders, the wrecking of many railroads, and a general weakening of the confidence of the people in the system of private control. The people have tried regulation, both National and State, with very unsatisfactory results. We started out to stop the collection of excessive rates, but made no provision at the other end for stopping the leaks. It would appear that we felt secure in the idea that if we could prevent the railroads from taking unjust toll from the shipper we had solved our problem. We discovered, however, that the prevention of the roads from collecting excessive rates had no connection or relation whatever to their ability to speculate in the properties themselves and manipulate them in such a manner as to throw them into bankruptcy and through this operation eliminate the shareholders and greatly destroy the general usefulness of the roads and their ability to secure new capital for their development and extension.

THE WRECKING OF THE ROCK ISLAND.

As a result of this practice we have witnessed the wrecking of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad, the New Haven, the Boston & Maine, the Frisco, and many others during the last 10 or 15 years. In fact, at the present moment there are some thirty or forty thousand miles of railroads in the United States in the hands of receivers. Some of these roads we know have been thrown into the hands of a receiver when they were in a perfectly solvent condition by the manipulation of these plunderbunders who specialize in the wrecking of railroads. The Rock Island is probably the most glaring example of this particular industry. The story of the wrecking of the Rock Island Railroad is equal to that of any "Diamond Dick" novel that has ever been printed, and the men who were responsible for the mismanagement and bankruptcy of this property should have been put in the penitentiary long ago. The truth is that as highwaymen they make the performances of Jesse James look trivial and inconsequential. This gang of Wall Street plunderbunders did nothing that required courage. They merely hired a few lawyers to organize two holding companies at an expense to the property of about $300,000 for organization purposes and proceeded to manipulate this great and profitable railroad system in such a manner as to force it into bankruptcy and ruin.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. Does the gentleman know any of these high financiers who have been put in jail where they belong?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I do not remember right now whether any of them have been put in jail or not, but you have my opinion in regard to it.

When they took hold of this road in 1901 its stock was selling in the markets of the world at above $200 a share. It had something like $10,000,000 of surplus and was paying a good dividend to its stockholders. It had a net income of over $5,000,000 a year. In 1914, the year in which the Interstate Commerce Commission made a report upon its condition, its stock had shrunk to about $20 a share, representing a loss to the men who had put their money into the building up of this great property of tens of millions of dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I yield the gentleman 20 minutes more.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. The men belonging to this particular Wall Street wrecking crew were J. H. Moore, W. H. Moore, D. G. Reid, W. B. Leeds, and others of less importance. After more than a decade of misrule and theft the road was finally forced into the hands of a receiver. Even after that the deception continued. The court was urged by the Peabody Protective Committee to default in payment of interest on certain securities and in the refusal of the court to comply, the court left the inference that the only motive the Peabody committee had was to get an excuse to foreclose on the securities of a perfectly solvent property and take them at much less than their value.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I will.

Mr. LONDON. What year did all these things occur?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. This reign of culpability began in 1901 and ended in 1914 or 1915.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. What railroad is the gentleman talking about, the Rock Island?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Yes; the Rock Island and its holding companies. Sometimes the report refers to the Iowa company and sometimes to the New Jersey company, but they are merely holding companies for the Rock Island.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman would not put all of the railroads of the country on the same basis?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Oh, no; I am differentiating between the honest men and the crooks in the railroad world.

Later on the road did default in interest payment on certain bonds of the road that were secured by over $71,000,000 of the stock, the stock that sold for $200 a share the year the wreckers got possession of the road. This block of $71,000,000 face value was sold under order of the court for a little over $7,000,000. The outrage was complete. This Mr. Peabody is president of the Mutual Life Insurance Co. The same Mr. Peabody was in at the killing also when the New Haven went under. Here is what a witness before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House, a Mr. Amster, who is a director in the Rock Island Co., and who has suffered from the rape of the Rock Island, has to say about Mr. Peabody and his banker friends:

The New Haven stock was considered a gilt-edge investment and sold at over $200 per share. It is now selling under $30. The company's books show that 26,000 defenseless men, women, and insurance companies own the stock of the company, and that very little, if any, is held in the name of the banker directors who managed the property during its prosperous period. One insurance company, the Mutual Life, whose president, Charles A. Peabody, is a warm friend of the great banking firm that handled the New Haven finances, owns 35,000 shares, at an average cost of $155 per share, but this poor investment, and doubtless other railroad investments of this insurance company, belong to the policyholders and not to the president or trustees of the company Thus we see how the wrecking of railroads affects thousands of innocent people who are helpless to prevent it aside from those who have purchased railroad stocks directly as an investment.

But to come back to the Rock Island, let us see how they robbed the road through salary accounts, gifts, and contributions to campaign funds. Notice this salary list and a few other grafts as reported by the Interstate Commerce Commission during the reign of the plunderbunders:

SALARIES AND CONTRIBUTIONS TO OFFICERS AND DIRECTORS.

The salaries paid to some of the principal officers at various points were as follows:

H. U. Mudge, president, $60,000.

L. F. Loree, chairman executive committee (one-half to be paid by the Frisco), $75,000.

R. A. Jackson, vice president and general solicitor, $50,000.

R. R. Cable, member board of directors, $32,000.

W. B. Leeds, president, $32,000.

B. L. Winchel, president, $40,000.

B. F. Yoakum, chairman executive committee, $30,000.

Daniel C. Reid, chairman board of directors, $32,000.

C. H. Warren, first vice president, $35,000.

W. G. Purdy, upon his retirement from the presidency, was given two years' salary at $22,500 per annum.

SOME OF THE CONTRIBUTIONS.

Following are specific instances shown of record of contributions referred to:

J. E. Gorman, first vice president in charge of freight and passenger traffic, was secretly paid $18,750, making his total compensation $43,750, whereas the pay roll showed $25,000.

C. A. Morse, chief engineer, received a salary of $15,000 per year and a secret bonus of $3,000 on the first of each year.

Upon the retirement of R. A. Jackson as general solicitor he was given $100,000 in cash.

As an inducement to L. F. Loree, chairman of the executive committee, to relinquish, after 10 months' service, a joint contract with the railway company and the Frisco, under which he was to receive a salary of $75,000 per annum for a period of five years, and in addition was to be paid a bonus of $500,000 at the expiration of the contract, he was given bonds of the railway company of a par value of $450,000. This was borne equally by the two companies, and the proportion of the railroad company was charged to profit and loss. The total amount borne by the railway company in this transaction exceeded $250,000.

C. H. Warren, vice president, was given by the railway company $150,000 in par value of the common and $105,000 in par value of the preferred stock of the New Jersey company and $50,000 in cash. There was no board of authorization for the latter expenditure, the item being represented in the records of the railway company merely by a voucher signed by D. G. Reid.

R. R. Cable, a member of the executive committee, received from the railway company $30,000 in bonds of the Iowa Co., then worth $24,500, for his services in the acquisition of the Burlington, Cedar Rapids & Northern Railway Co., and he was paid by the latter company $85,000 in the same transaction. Mr. Cable also received another contribution which will be referred to later.

Robert Mather, vice president, was given $25,000 in cash.

George T. Boggs, director and secretary of the directors of the railway company, was given $15,000 in cash when he retired from the secretaryship of the railway company.

As hereinbefore indicated, when the capital stock of the railway company was increased to $75,000,000, shares of the par value of $880,500 were placed in the name of the president, to be thereafter distributed in accordance with the following resolution of the executive committee passed at a meeting held in New York July 1, 1902:

Resolved, That such portion as the president may determine of the shares of the increased capital stock of the company not required for the purpose of the foregoing resolutions shall be disposed of at par by the president for the benefit of such officers of the company as the president shall elect and determine.

This stock was later exchanged for securities of the Iowa and New Jersey companies in the same manner as was stock of the stockholders of the railway company.

Following this exchange R. R. Cable received securities of a market value of $368,300, for which he paid $200,000.

H. A. Parker, first vice-president, received securities then worth $27,000, for which he paid but $15,000.

Robert Mather received securities of a market value of $145,912 above his payments therefor.

The contributions to officials of the railway company in excess of their salaries aggregated about a million dollars.

Mr. RUSSELL. Were not a lot of fellows indicted for that?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I do not know.

Mr. LOBECK. Did the Government assist this road by giving it land?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. Is it the gentleman's belief that if we had Federal control any such things as this would happen?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Absolutely no; no such things could happen.

IRREGULAR VOUCHER PAYMENTS.

The books of the railway company reveal payments aggregating $44,066.05 to the Denver Post. The vouchers attached read, "For advertising in editorial news columns." Other entries show that three of these vouchers, aggregating $20,000, cover a refund that this newspaper received at the rate of 35 cents per hundred on its freight carried over the lines of the railway company from points in Wisconsin.

Another voucher is for $50,000 to S. M. Felton, for the railway's proportion of amount "paid by E. H. Harriman and his associates for money expended by them to secure the discontinuance of a line of road being constructed in 1900 between Peoria, Ill., and Clinton, Iowa, as per agreement between R. R. Cable, chairman of the board, and E. H. Harriman."

Now, after having merely slanted at the mismanagement of the Rock Island in the hands of bank speculators on a big scale, and knowing that there are scores of other roads almost if not quite as badly managed, can anyone say the public interest will suffer if no date is set for the return of these roads to their alleged owners? For my part I am satisfied beyond a doubt that they never should be turned back to private control under any conditions that I can now foresee are possible to exist. The truth is the people have lost confidence in the management of the railroads by Wall Street bankers who have secured control of them. They have witnessed the operation of receiverships, the elimination of small stockholders, the reissuance of new stocks and bonds under reorganization, again bankruptcy and elimination of stockholders, until the investors of the country who are not engaged in this business of manipulating railroads have refused largely to buy railroad stocks and bonds. The only practical outlet that bankers now have for the sale of their railroad stocks and bonds is to foist them off on trust companies, insurance companies, and widows and orphans who must follow the recommendations of their bankers. The net result is that instead of having railroads constructed where railroads are needed, tracks doubled, equipment multiplied, we have only the barest necessities supplied in the great majority of cases, so that when a stress is put upon the transportation facilities of the country, such as was brought about by this war, the railroads have been utterly unable to do the work placed upon them. It seems to me that the proof is complete.

COMPLAIN OF LOW RATES.

These railroad manipulators complain that their trouble is all caused by the refusal of the people to let them collect larger rates, when, as a matter of fact, the railroads have suffered not so much from low rates as they have from mismanagement and the destruction of the confidence of the people in those in control of the roads. To give them higher rates in some cases like the Pennsylvania, for example, merely means greater profits and surplus, which is in turn capitalized and a new cry goes up for higher rates to make more surplus to be capitalized, leaving the road as hungry as ever. The people get weary of paying excess rates for the purpose of furnishing stock dividends to stockholders as in such cases. In other cases a prosperous road with a reputation for dependable earnings becomes a ready prey for the "wrecking crew." Its newly watered stock would be as easily sold, as was the case with the Rock Island & New Haven. If the investors had not witnessed the operations of these plunderbunders in wrecking roads and eliminating stockholders, there would be much less trouble to get investments in railroad stocks, but so long as so many roads are in the control of men who make a business of speculating in them, just so long will there be a distrust in that sort of an investment. The marvel is that anyone who knows anything at all would put a dollar in railroad stocks, generally speaking.

Now, if private control of railroads has proven a failure—as no one can dispute, if you measure it by the test of the roads being able to do the work the country requires of them—then why is it that some of us are so insistent upon fixing a date when these roads are to be turned back to their alleged corporate owners? Why hurry back with such haste to men who have been unable to accomplish the task that has been given them? I do not charge in a wholesale way that all railroads have been mismanaged. That is not so. Many railroads have been very effectually managed. Perhaps the majority of them have been satisfactorily managed in normal times, but the large minority that have been mismanaged are almost as essential to the success of the whole as is the majority. For example, the thirty or forty thousand miles of railroad that are now in the hands of receivers cover a vast territory that is dependent wholly upon them, and are so vital to the welfare of the Nation as a whole that their failure can be considered of the utmost importance in the consideration of this subject.

TWO CLASSES OPPOSE FEDERAL CONTROL.

If we can demonstrate by the present system of Federal control that we can eliminate all of the troubles from which we have heretofore suffered through the issuance of watered stock and speculation in the properties, we will have turned the country away from Government ownership, because there is no one who would not prefer private ownership if private ownership were successful and the interests of the people, as well as the roads, were protected. The reason that there is a clamor for Government ownership is not because there are any considerable number of people in this country who really favor Government ownership as a matter of principle, but rather they think of it as a necessity. But if we can demonstrate under Federal control that the difficulties we are now suffering from can be removed, and that these roads can be operated in private hands under Federal control successfully, then the possibility of Government ownership will have passed from us forever. But it is the fear of Government ownership that lies at the root of the insistence of many Members of Congress upon the limitation being placed in this section.

The other class, which is a very minor one, consists exclusively of a coterie of Wall Street bankers who are engaged in railroad speculation and the operators and executives of the roads that excessively profit through their operation. This class, of course, want the roads turned back to them as quickly as possible—to-morrow if it could be accomplished. This class, in my judgment, will attempt to make the Federal control of railroads a failure. They will attempt to demonstrate to the country that the Federal Government can not control these railroads successfully, in order that we may hasten to turn them back to them, so that they can again start on their round of manipulation, speculation, and wrecking of railroads, and piling up as a result countless millions of profit.

WHY FEAR FEDERAL CONTROL?

I have pointed out the two classes that are interested in having a day set for the return of these railroads to their corporate owners. Is this insistence possibly due to fear that their properties are to be neglected during Government control? Not at all. We provide in this bill that they shall be liberally maintained. Not only that, but that extensions shall be made where necessary, terminals shall be constructed, rolling stock shall be added—in fact, betterments of every kind and character are to be made where necessary. So it can not be for these reasons that they insist upon a limitation being fixed.

Are they afraid that their properties will be bankrupted during Government operation? Not at all, because the Federal Government agrees to finance them at the lowest possible rate of interest—even to buy their bonds when necessary. There can be no risk whatever run by the owners of these properties in leaving them in the control of the Government until Congress shall otherwise direct.

Is it because they fear that they will not be able to pay dividends to the stockholders? No; because the Government guarantees a standard return equal to their average earnings for the past three years, two of which were the best in the history of the roads.

Is it because stockholders are worried about the results of Federal control and are urging the executives of the roads to demand that a day be set for their return? Certainly not. The stockholders are not in the least doubt about the success of the Federal control. In fact, when the President's proclamation directing the Secretary of War to take over the roads was issued railroad stocks immediately went up, showing that the stockholders had greater confidence in the Government than they had in the railroad managers. The stockholders of the railroads know the history of private control as well as anyone, because they have suffered from it very greatly. Hundreds of thousands of them have had their savings of a lifetime swept away by the mismanagement, speculation, and bankruptcy of railroads by these highbinders of Wall Street. It is difficult indeed to conceive of any reason why a stockholder of the railroads would prefer private control to Government control.

Is the public clamoring for a day to be set for the return of these roads to their corporate owners? No, the public certainly has no objection to Federal control, but, on the other hand, welcomes it, because it has removed all the barriers to an economic operation of the roads. Cooperation of the roads has been brought about. Freight is being moved through the shortest routes and over the least congested lines; useless competition has been eliminated; scores of ports little used are to be opened; and gradually it is hoped the congestion of the roads is being cleared away. The public can not fail to be greatly benefited by this application of economic principles.

By the process of elimination I have apparently left only the two classes first named—those who fear Government ownership and those who profit in the manipulation and speculation in railroad properties.

BANKS CONTROL WITH 1 PER CENT OWNERSHIP OF STOCK.

To me it is inconceivable that any considerable number of people should be misled in the discussion of this subject, the facts are so clear and conclusive. Here we have $18,000,000,000 worth of railroad property that was, previous to Government control, in the control of a coterie of Wall Street bankers. This bank control exists through the ownership of possibly 1 per cent of the stock of these roads. Think of it; $18,000,000,000 worth of property controlled by a coterie of Wall Street speculators and bankers and operated largely for their own interest and profit through and by the actual ownership of only 1 per cent of the property.

We have gentlemen who advocate the fixing of a day for the return of these roads, referring with a good deal of feeling to the moral side of the question. They call our attention to the fact that as a war measure we are ruthlessly taking away from the lawful owners these railroad properties, and we should therefore hasten, the moment the war is over, to return them again to their lawful owners. This sentiment is entirely wasted on me, and it should be a complete waste on anyone who has a knowledge of the facts. Millions of stockholders, scattered all over the world, own these railroad companies. A few manipulators manage to get themselves elected members of boards of directors of the various roads—especially the profitable ones. They become possessed of the transfer books, which contain the list of stockholders. They secure proxies of these stockholders and vote them at their annual meetings. The stockholders are scattered everywhere. They know absolutely nothing about the control and management of their properties. They have no means of finding out anything about them. The only thing they can do is to send their proxies to the officers who are in control, and these officers consist of those who have managed, by hook or crook, to secure the control of the properties by a very small ownership of stock.

In view of this well-known condition, it is certainly not a convincing argument to urge that from any moral standpoint we are bound to set a day for the return of these roads to these alleged corporate owners, without regard whatever to legislation that will be sadly needed to protect the real stockholders before the transfer is made.

OPPOSED TO GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP EXCEPT AS LAST RESORT.

Personally I am very much opposed to Government ownership if there is any other way in which the best results can be obtained. My own view is that the present system is approaching the method that will ultimately be found to be a success in the control and operation of the roads. At any rate, there should be no haste whatever in turning these roads back until the widest possible discussion has been had upon the result of it. And it must be sufficiently extended after the war has been concluded, in order to know whether or not it can be successfully carried on in time of peace.

THREE METHODS.

There are three possible methods open to us for handling the railroads. The first method has been in operation for a great many years, namely, private ownership and control under State and Federal regulation. Many men thought our problems were solved when we adopted Federal and State regulation of railroads. It is apparent now, however, that the mere regulation of rates and competition only removes a few of our troubles. It in no way removed the great evil of watered stocks and the manipulations of speculators. It left the roads without coordination and with competition that does not contribute to an economic operation of the lines.

The second method of handling the roads is the one now put in operation as a war necessity, namely, Federal control, with private ownership. The results are yet to be demonstrated.

The third method of operation that is advocated by some people as a solution of our difficulties is Government ownership.

The first method of private control with the Government regulation has been in operation sufficiently long to prove beyond a question of doubt that it never can be successfully used. Under this system we have witnessed the wrecking of scores of railroads since the Interstate Commerce Commission was established. We have witnessed the flotation of stocks over and above the actual values of the roads to the amount of billions of dollars. Most of this stock in the last 50 years has been wiped out of existence by foreclosures through bankruptcy, and, of course, became a complete loss to investors. Competition has been idiotic and uneconomic. The people for a long time believed that railroads must compete. I can recall in the good old days for the speculators, when a railroad ticket could be bought from Omaha to San Francisco for $5, when rebates were common, when legislatures were corrupted. All of these things have been in a measure cured by regulation, but they have left still the canker that destroys the roads and utterly destroys our ability to get new roads, in that it has left the speculator with the ability to destroy the original property, but without any inducement for constructing new properties. In the old days without regulation it was an easy matter for the speculator to construct new lines, water the stock, collect rates that he saw fit, and make enough money out of the construction of the road to make it a great inducement for men with means to build new roads and develop new sections of country. Federal regulation has now made it impossible for this sort of railroad builder to operate and make any money out of it, with the result that no new lines to speak of are now being built under regulation. There is no prospect of any new railroad development under Federal and State regulation. Men who have money are not going out into the field to construct new railroads unless they have an opportunity to make a speculative profit out of the deal. That opportunity no longer exists under regulation. The only opportunity that is left the speculator now is to manipulate the roads in such a manner as to force them into bankruptcy, close out the stockholders, and take the roads at their own price.

Under the second method, the one now in vogue, Federal control seems to me to be the solution of all these difficulties. For example, under Federal control a Federal railroad board can be organized with power to control all of the railroads of the country, pool their profits, pool their service, issue the stocks and bonds of the Federal railroad company in exchange for the stocks and bonds of the existing roads, and thus secure for the people a complete coordinated system where there would be no advantage whatever to one road securing more traffic than another, with the result of congesting the traffic and piling up the profits on one road to the disadvantage of another, because they would all share alike in the profits of the roads in general, or, rather, share in proportion to the value of their stocks.

Under this system we would not find the traffic congested on a few great arteries of trade and centered in a few great terminals, like New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, St. Louis, and San Francisco, but every port in the country would be developed, steamship lines established at those ports to take care of the traffic, and the traffic would flow over the shortest and most economic routes. There would be no more trouble about the issuance of stocks and bonds. These would all rest in the hands of the Federal Government through the Federal board. All of the speculation in these securities would be gone, and they would have values as fixed as Government bonds.

This would certainly be to the interest of the public, because the stabilization of the values of these securities would induce the public to invest in them to the largest possible extent; whereas, now, under private control, as I stated before, practically only the widows and orphans and insurance companies invest in these stocks, because they were advised to do so by their bankers. In fact, the insurance company's funds have been used by these railroad manipulators very largely to finance their operations.

The third method, that of Government ownership and operation, has not been tested in practice in this country, and, of course, one man's opinion is as good as another, as to the results possible under that system. However, the question is not now an issue, but is certain to become one the very moment the question of returning these roads to private control under former conditions is brought before Congress.

RAILROADS HAVE TWO BOSSES.

Another reason for the failure of the roads to do the work of the country lies in the fact that they have two bosses who to a large degree have interests directly opposed to each other. On the one hand, we have the operators of the roads representing the stockholders trying to get as high a rate for service as it is possible to get. Whereas, on the other hand, are the representatives of the people, through their Federal and State railroad commissions, trying to keep the rates as low as possible. There is a constant struggle going on between these two forces all the time with varying results.

It seems to me that the principle involved in this method of regulation was doomed to failure in advance. Private business partnerships are notoriously hard to sustain when the interests of both partners are identical, but to think of a business partnership succeeding where one of the partners is interested in having the business make a good profit while the other is not interested in the concern making any profit, is absurd. That being true of a private business partnership, it is equally true of the partnership control and operation of the roads by joint action of the Government and the owners.

For the Government to attempt to regulate the income of roads by fixing rates and at the same time pay no heed to the expenses of the roads as made by the operators is quite absurd, yet that is the way we have been doing it. Certainly the power to fix the income must also be the power to fix the outgo, yet for a quarter of a century we have apparently ignored this basic principle at the root of business success. This power to fix the outgo must also be the power to regulate the bills payable; that is, the issuance of stocks and bonds. Yet under private control with Government regulation all sorts of crooked stock and bond issues have been floated. In fact, there has been no regulation of any real value in the use of this very important power. Irresponsible directorates are largely to blame for the misuse of their powers.

METHODS OF CHOOSING DIRECTORS.

Another evil of the system of private control and Federal regulation is the evil arising out of the powers of incorporation. For example, members of boards of directors are elected by stockholders without any knowledge of their competency or fitness in any way. Some of the best-paying roads are owned very largely by women and children, charity institutions, trust companies, and so forth. The owners of these and all roads, in fact, have absolutely no voice in their management and do not even know the board of directors they elect, if they vote at all. The great mass of stockholders vote by proxy as requested by the boards of directors in office. They do not know one another, nor the directors they vote for, save in rare instances. Sometimes a good board is elected, but through no virtue of the knowledge of the stockholders of the road. The facts are there is no more merit in this system of choosing directors than there would be in having a crazy man pick a board by chance from a crowd of people passing him on the street. The board picked by a crazy man under such a method might possibly have an advantage over the present system, because the men picked would be innocent of ulterior motives at least, and to begin with free from purely speculative desires. When one considers the value of these great properties and the far-reaching influence their use has upon civilization, one can but marvel at the careless methods employed in their management. The wonder is they have been as well managed as they have. In fact, considering the opportunities for fraud and mismanagement, one might reasonably take the fact that the roads are in no worse condition than they are as really a tribute to the high character and integrity of the majority of the men behind them. The fact that fraud and mismanagement has destroyed public confidence to a large degree is no fault of these men back of the successfully managed roads. They certainly can not profit by these mismanaged properties about them, with all the bad odor that goes with it. If they do not now, while the shackles of presidents are broken, make a strike for liberty from the evil influences and operations of speculators, they will find the old shackles reriveted after the war is over.

The roads should be set free from the raids of the wreckers and their earnings made secure for payment of honest investors so that values may be stabilized in order that extensions and betterments may be made. There has been absolutely no way suggested that will bring about these conditions safeguarding all interests, excepting through Federal control by means of a Federal railroad corporation with full and complete power to control and operate the roads as a unit.

The Federal control over national banks through the Federal Reserve Board has proven a great boon to the country. No one would think of abandoning that system now. There is no reason why the same successful principle can not be applied to the roads. The banks are privately owned. No one calls that system of control Government ownership. The method of Federal control of roads provided for in this bill can be slightly modified and made into a perfectly workable system for the roads along the lines of the Federal reserve act. The results would be far-reaching indeed. It would result in control of stock and bond issues, unification of service, elimination of useless competition, development of ports and distribution of traffic, standardization of construction, a fair freight rate, and a fair return on investment in properties, and the prevention of speculation.

With such a purpose in view I have done my best to convince my colleagues that the placing of a two-year limit in section 14 for the return of these roads to their owners is an effort to turn the hands of the clock of progress backward, and I sincerely hope that the limitation will be stricken out. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON], a member of the committee.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, this bill is a war measure. The Government has an absolute right under existing law to take over the control and possession of the railroads as a war necessity. During the period of Federal control the Government must pay a just and fair compensation for the use of the property.

The main features of the bill under consideration are:

First. Within certain bounds and limitations the President is empowered to make a voluntary agreement with the carrier with respect to the value of the use of the property during the period of Federal control.

Second. A board of referees or arbitrators is created to report in each case the just compensation that should be allowed the carrier for the use of its property, and upon the report of such board the President may enter into an agreement with the carrier for just compensation, not in excess of the finding of the board.

Third. If these two methods of reaching a contract fails, then the Court of Claims, on the motion of either party, shall ascertain the amount of just compensation for the use of the property during such Federal control.

Fourth. Provisions are made for betterments and extensions, and a revolving fund is created, out of which expenditures may be made for such betterments and extensions during the period of control.

Fifth. The President may, when in his judgment it is necessary in the public interest, initiate rates, fares, charges, classifications, and regulations or practices by filing the same with the Interstate Commerce Commission in the method and manner as he shall direct. The Interstate Commerce Commission shall then investigate and report thereon to the President for such action as he may deem required in the public interest.

Sixth. The Federal control shall continue for and during the period of the war and a reasonable time thereafter, which shall not exceed two years after the ratification of the treaty of peace.

On December 26, 1917, the President issued his proclamation to the effect that at noon on December 28, 1917, the Government would take possession and assume control of the systems of transportation in order that they might be utilized for the transfer and transportation of troops, war supplies, and equipment to the exclusion, as far as might be necessary, of all other traffic thereon.

This proclamation was made under a provision of the act approved August 29, 1916, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," viz:

> The President, in time of war, is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation, or any part thereof, and to utilize the same, to the exclusion as far as may be necessary of all other traffic thereon, for the transfer or transportation of troops, war material, and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable.

Under this provision it will, in my judgment, be conceded that the President had the right to take over the possession and control of the railroads. It would seem, however, that the President, through his Director General of Railroads, is assuming powers not heretofore granted. The President's proclamation provides:

> Until and except so far as said director shall from time to time otherwise by general or special orders determine, such systems shall remain subject to all existing statutes and orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to all statutes and orders of regulating commissions of the various States in which said systems or any part thereof may be situated. But any orders, general or special, hereafter made by said director, shall have paramount authority and be obeyed as such.

Here is found a clear assumption of power over existing law. He directs that the orders of the Director General of Railroads shall have paramount authority and be obeyed as such. This means that all existing Federal statutes, all orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and all statutes of the various States and orders of railroad boards of various States of the Union are subject to nullification and displacement by the paramount authority of the Director General whenever he may so order. One of the objects of this bill is to perpetuate these powers.

If this power exists, the Director General may nullify every Federal and State statute affecting railroad rates and operation and every order of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of all of the State railroad boards. If this power be exercised, the Director General will supersede all of the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission and State railway commissions relative to the operation of the railroads and the fixing of just and reasonable rates and charges.

Under this power the carrier might be released from making full report of accidents to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The boiler-inspection law, the safety-appliance act, the hours-of-service act, and the eight-hour day law could all be held for naught because the order of the Director General of Railroads is by the proclamation made supreme and paramount over all laws and orders.

It seems to me it must be conceded that the control and possession is for war purposes, for the transportation of troops, war material, and equipment, and that the railroads are to be utilized for that purpose "to the exclusion as far as may be necessary of all other traffic thereon."

Under the law and proclamation the commerce is divided into two classes: First, the transportation of troops, war material, and equipment; second, "all other traffic thereon." Under the first classification the military supremacy is supreme, and because of this supremacy the second classification becomes a mere incident in the railroad operation.

It is the duty of the military authorities to assist the civil authorities in arresting offenders and violators of law upon process issued by the civil or criminal courts. The civil authorities and the military authorities should assist each other in administration of the law. The power to provide for the general welfare is not limited in time of war, and one authority is not hostile to the other.

The military sovereignty is supreme in the line of its operation, but it does not overturn the Federal and State laws nor does it annul the powers of the courts to fix reasonable and just freight rates. Railroad rate making is not a military function but is a civil function administered by the courts for the general welfare of those interested in the commerce of the country.

We should ungrudgingly give all the power necessary to the Director General of Railroads for a successful operation of the roads in the prosecution of the war.

The fixing of rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices of carriers is not a war power. There is no necessity for the military sovereignty to take over these functions. If all the power over operation of the railroads is secure it certainly would not be necessary to destroy the State and Federal machinery for rate making.

It is insisted that the demurrage regulations should be administered by the Director General. When analyzed, however, such necessity is not apparent. Why should the commerce of the country be disorganized and confused? If it becomes necessary to secure speedy unloading of the cars the war power could be brought into play. The war power could force the consignee to unload; in case he failed to do so, the military power could unload the cars and send them on their journey.

Neither is the routing of all commercial freight an absolute necessity. The movement of troops, war material, and equipment is a military necessity, and unlimited power should be granted to the military authorities so that these instrumentalities could be speedily used in the work in which we are now engaged.

Let the Interstate Commerce Commission and the State railroad boards attend to the rates, regulations, and practices and give the Director General all power necessary to operate the roads, disturbing the commerce of the country as little as possible. The rates now fixed by law should remain substantially as they are because our guaranty as to compensation rests upon this standard. The Interstate Commerce Commission should not be abolished nor should its functions be impaired. The Director General can be given the power necessary to run the roads without encroaching on the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission, because the commission has nothing to do with operation. The Interstate Commerce Commission stands between the shipper and carrier with respect to rates, but that does not interfere with granting the Director General the full and complete power of operation.

If Congress permits the military power to fix the rates, it would allow the military power the right to tax the shipper by increasing the rates above the rates now fixed by law. Every increase above a reasonable rate is a tax. Who ought to levy this tax, the Congress or the Director General of Railroads? The taxing power has always remained in Congress, and Congress should reserve to itself at all times the taxing function.

There are 30,000 miles of short-line roads not to be taken over, and the rate-making power as to these short lines will rest in the Interstate Commerce Commission, while, on the other hand, the fixing of the rates on the big lines will be vested in the Director General. As shown in the evidence, the large companies, or the best conducted companies, are making from 7 to 30 per cent, some of them more than that, upon the capital invested, which is clearly beyond a reasonable rate for the capital invested. The value of the use of the property at the time of the taking must form the basis of compensation unless there is some limitation in this bill whereby we can place a legislative bar or limit upon it. If you pass this bill as it is drawn and leave out that limitation, then these companies will go into court and recover every penny of their earning capacity if it be even 75 per cent.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman has made the statement that some of these companies were getting unreasonable compensation under this bill, some as high as 30 per cent. Does the gentleman think that is just compensation?

Mr. DILLON. I think it is clearly beyond just compensation for a company that is engaged in the public service, and I believe the Congress ought to place a limitation upon it so as to prevent the carrier from receiving such a compensation.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to ask the gentleman how he would fix it so that a company that had made 30 per cent would be on an equality with a company that was operating, perhaps, a competitive line and making no money. Where would you draw the line between the two?

Mr. DILLON. I would draw the line by saying that all net income above 7 or 8 per cent that might be derived during war time should go into the revolving fund to be used to protect the Government in its guaranty.

COMPENSATION OF THE CARRIERS.

What is the measure of compensation that should be allowed the carriers for the use of property taken from them as a war measure? The taking of this use is the taking of property under the Constitution. The carrier is entitled to just compensation for the use of its property.

I know of no better rule to guide the fixing of this compensation than that of the demonstrated value of the use. The profits that the carrier has been making probably would constitute the best basis to estimate the value of the use to the owner. These carriers have been making earnings under rates fixed by the Government and these rates are presumed to be reasonable.

If under these rates the company has been able to earn in the past 25 per cent on its capital invested, and the Government deprives the company of the use of its property, it ought to pay as just compensation the value of the use; but we must not forget that the carrier is engaged in a public service. There is great force in the argument that the carrier ought to have substantially the same return after the Government deprives it of the use of its property as it was making under its own operation.

Under the provisions of this bill I do not see how the compensation can be reduced below the previous earnings, because the carrier can go into court and prove that it was entitled to a just compensation for the use of its property. The compensation provision is predicated upon depriving the carrier of so much money for the use of its property. Our claim for reduction of net income must rest upon fixed rates. We must place a limit upon the net income, otherwise the carrier will be entitled to compensation based upon existing law.

The duty of the carrier is to perform a public service at a reasonable rate. If the road accumulates an immense surplus or pays excessive dividends, such surplus or excessive dividends would constitute a convincing argument that the rates have been too high.

The carrier must have a fair return on the fair value of its property. This must be conceded. Congress has donated land grants to many roads. Counties, towns, and cities have issued bonds to finance railroad construction. People have given rights of way, terminals, and vast sums if money to secure these public highways. I do not see how Congress can now make any set-off or any claim against the carrier by reason of these donations and gifts.

It matters not how the carriers obtained these properties so long as they are used in the public service. The money may be stolen. It may have been secured by robbery, by levying tribute on the shipper, by unreasonable charges, by discrimination, by wrong or oppression. Still when these funds are put into the public service they belong to the carrier.

Because of these contributions the Government could not now refuse to pay the fair value of the use of the property. The title as between the Government and the carrier can not be questioned, nor can the Government set up a trusteeship over the funds heretofore obtained and undertake to make a redistribution of these funds.

For more than 10 years, the Interstate Commerce Commission has been deciding what rates are reasonable and what rates are unreasonable. During all the period of regulation the carrier could have gone into court and proved, if such were the facts, that it was not receiving a fair return upon the capital invested. Because they have not done so we must assume that their earnings have brought reasonable returns on the capital invested.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Can the gentleman point out a particular road that is making 25 per cent or above that?

Mr. DILLON. Oh, yes; some of them are making more than that. The Burlington is making 22 per cent. I read from Senator CUMMINS's minority report. The Duluth, Missabe & Northern Railroad is making 114 per cent; the Panhandle & Santa Fe Road is making 64 per cent; the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railroad is making 52 per cent; the Colorado & Wyoming Railroad, 162 per cent; the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk, 35 per cent; the Cumberland Valley Railroad, 24 per cent; the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad Co., 647 per cent.

Mr. SNYDER. Is there any way the Interstate Commerce Commission can make a rate which would be different for one road from that of another carrying the same commodity?

Mr. DILLON. I think not. I think the rate must be general, and that is where the trouble comes. The weaker roads, it is said, must make the profits upon the capital invested, and it is upon that theory that the excessive rates are made; it is upon that theory that the big roads have been able to plunder the public.

Mr. SNYDER. Is it contemplated under this bill that the President, having the right to make rates, shall make a rate that will make the road that has been operated unprofitably hereafter operate profitably and make money upon the basis of those that have been handled efficiently?

Mr. DILLON. I do not think the Director would do that, but I do think that every one of these railroad companies, when they get into court, will recover upon the demonstrated value of their property, and when they do that they are recovering against the Government excess profits that they ought not to recover, and these excesses should be handled now by the Congress by setting a limit on those that are making excessive profits and turning the excess profits into the revolving fund in order to protect the Government.

Mr. SNYDER. Does not the gentleman think that under the present form of excess-profits tax the Government will lay its hand on this additional amount that he thinks they ought not to make?

Mr. DILLON. The taxing law must be general as to everybody in the same class, but that gives the Government but little protection. Here is a road that is making 50 per cent profit. I say this congressional body ought to say to that road, "You are working for the public and in the public service, and we will not tolerate such a percentage, therefore we will turn the excess into a revolving fund during the time of war to protect the National Government."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Has the gentleman read the speech of Senator KELLOGG, of Minnesota, which appears in the RECORD of the 15th, delivered on the 13th, in which he explains fully that these very large returns of those roads to which the gentleman refers, in which he says that the percentage of the value of the property is very small compared to anything like what is reported?

Mr. DILLON. I have not read Senator KELLOGG's speech.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman will find an explanation of it in that speech.

Mr. DILLON. But it was shown in the hearing and is undisputed that these roads are making these immense sums, and we should not allow them to do it in the time of war.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Under the provisions of this bill now pending before this committee, will these roads that the gentleman has just enumerated continue to make the same returns hereafter that they have heretofore?

Mr. DILLON. Yes; and not only that, but those great railroads do not want to put a limit on for a return of the property. The attorney who represented the railroads came before the committee and was going to argue the limitation question, but when he finally came back he petered out and never touched the question.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to ask the gentleman for information one more question, and I do not want to interfere with his argument, but are these profits that he has mentioned of from 25 to 50 per cent based on the capitalization of the railroads or the actual value of the property?

Mr. DILLON. Well, it is based upon their net earnings on their stock.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. As I understand from tables I have received, the gentleman takes the Bessemer & Lake Erie, and under the plan proposed we will be paying it 27.63 per cent on its capital stock. Now, as I understand the gentleman, he proposes to put a limitation and say they shall receive a standard return not exceeding 7 or 8 per cent on the capital stock?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. In other words, giving 7 per cent and the Government taking 20.

Mr. DILLON. Yes; or dividing the excess between them.

Mr. STEVENSON. And making it 15 per cent.

Mr. DILLON. The Government taking half and giving them half.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. I will.

Mr. DECKER. Does the gentleman favor leaving the power to fix the rates in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. DILLON. Most certainly it ought to be done.

Mr. DECKER. Does the gentleman do that on the theory they are a wise and efficient body?

Mr. DILLON. Yes; they have been the only rate-making body.

Mr. DECKER. Now, let me ask another question in connection with that. Is it not a fact that all these rates and these profits which the gentleman claims are excessive have been made under the sanction of this same body the gentleman wants to continue in power?

Mr. DILLON. Yes. But it is done under the theory that the little roads are not able to earn enough to receive just compensation on the capital invested. It is upon that ground that I claim the Congress should write into this bill a limitation as to these excess profits.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will permit, I will read the facts about the Bessemer; they are very short.

Mr. DILLON. I am afraid it will not allow me sufficient time to finish my argument. I will allow the gentleman to read it in his own time.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is the one who has made the charge.

Mr. DILLON. My time is limited and I do not think I will have enough time for that.

Mr. SIMS. Forty-five million capital stock——

Mr. DILLON. Let me proceed because I have something else to say.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. I will.

Mr. KINKAID. Has the gentleman prepared any amendment to offer on the line of his suggestions?

Mr. DILLON. No; but there will be one offered; if not, I will offer it.

By the rate-making power the Government has in a measure acquiesced in the rate-making power of the Interstate Commerce Commission and it may well be claimed that such rates have provided a fair return on the capital invested. Yet what right has the carrier to invest the surplus in extensions and then charge the public a reasonable return on these extensions? If the carrier is making 25 per cent on the money invested it proves that the rates are unreasonably high. If the carrier puts the surplus in extensions and then charges the public with reasonable returns on the funds so invested it proves again that the carrier is getting more than a fair return on the capital invested. Remember that the carrier as between the public and the Government is entitled to only a fair return on the capital invested.

I believe that 70 per cent of the railroad mileage of the country is earning more than a reasonable return on the money invested and that 30 per cent is earning less than a reasonable return on the money so invested.

If the provisions contained in this bill are carried out the 70 per cent of the mileage will be earning from 7 to 30 per cent on the capital invested, and unless some provision is placed in the bill to prevent so great an earning power by these great corporations engaged in a public service they will all get the demonstrated amount of their earning capacity. The other 30 per cent that has been earning but small income will receive a fair return on the capital invested, which will be much greater than they are now making.

Every one of the companies that are not making good rates will be given good rates when the compensation is fixed.

In view of the guarantee the Government is about to make, the financial aid that is about to be given, the sustaining of the credit of the railroads, the relieving them from all hazards and perils of war, from all uncertainties of business conditions, it is only just that at least a part of the excessive income of some of the roads should be converted into the Public Treasury, because they ought not receive more than a fair return on the capital invested.

When the income of the carrier reaches beyond a fair return the excess should be used in the interest of the public for a reduction of freight and passenger rates. By converting a part of this into the Treasury it enables the Government to reduce taxes.

The barrier against a reduction of rates has always been that the poorer roads must be allowed the higher rates in order to make a reasonable income. The same rates must apply to all roads, and therefore those more fortunately situated—the big roads—have been able to earn more than a reasonable and fair income.

In providing for compensation in this bill we have no right to go into the past and take the earnings heretofore distributed, but that rule has no application when we are legislating for the future. As to the future, Congress has, it seems to me, the absolute right to fix a limit above which the earnings should not go, and that the excess should be converted into the revolving fund to protect the Government in its general guarantee.

TIME FOR RETURN OF PROPERTY.

Under the terms of the bill the Federal control shall continue for a reasonable time after the war, not to exceed two years after the ratification of the treaty of peace. It will probably require two years to secure the ratification of the peace treaty.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. What limit does the gentleman think the Government ought to fix?

Mr. DILLON. I should think 7, 8, or 9 per cent, and then let the Government take half of the excess and give the carrier the other half. With that the carrier ought to be satisfied.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman know any road that is making that amount now?

Mr. DILLON. Oh, yes; I read a list of them. The gentleman was probably not here at the time, and I did not read half of them. I now pass to the question of the return of the property.

It will take two years to get a ratification of the peace treaty. Then if you add two more years that gives four years, and we are playing a fast and loose game with the people of this country. If so, the holding of the property might extend over a period of four years. This period of time ought to be materially reduced. It is altogether too long. In my judgment, six months after the ratification of the treaty of peace would be long enough.

The justification for the seizure of the property rests on military necessity. When military necessity ceases the right of possession ceases. When the war closes conditions will change and the right to operate on the payment of the value of the use no longer exists. A new right springs into existence—the right of ownership.

If this right is not brought into existence, then the property ought to be promptly returned, because the tenancy is necessarily ended. The consideration in the first instance is the value of the use. When the military necessity ceases a totally different compensation must be paid—the value of the property so taken. When the property itself is taken it becomes a second taking and the compensation must be a fair compensation for the value of the property.

When the war ends and the military necessity ceases, it becomes the duty of the Government to condemn the property and take it over or give it back. After a reasonable time has expired after the close of the war the holding of the property by the Government might be without the consent of the carrier and would be without justification and unlawful.

Such holding would be unfair to the stockholder. It would not do to say that we got possession of the use under the emergency of war, and we will take three or four years to determine whether or not we will return the property itself.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS] would hold somebody else's property and experiment upon it and run an experimental station and school in order to determine whether the people would want Government ownership. [Applause.]

Neither would it be right to say that we will hold on to the property and try out Government ownership, run a Government school with the property for three or four years to determine whether we like it or not, whether it will prove a good bargain or a bad one.

If the Government wishes to engage in this enterprise it ought to say so. If a sheriff levies upon property by virtue of a writ of execution, which is afterwards set aside, the law requires him to return the property before he can again levy on it. If his execution is paid he must immediately return the property. If he fails he becomes a trespasser, holding without right.

The Government should not blow hot and cold at the same time. It should promptly do its duty by returning the property or commencing condemnation proceedings for taking over the property and paying the value of the same. I am not opposing Government ownership, but I do oppose a fast-and-loose policy on behalf of a great Government. If we want Government ownership, let us say so. If we do not intend to take over the property, it is our duty to speak and say what is our policy. To remain silent with concealed purposes is not right and should not be tolerated.

Let us fix a definite time by a definite statement. By so doing we will discourage speculation. The public will know our purpose, and the business world will not be disturbed by uncertainty. Upon uncertainty the gamblers' games are played. Give the people certainty, and not uncertainty. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. I do.

Mr. SNYDER. A few moments ago I asked the gentleman whether or not these rates of per cent that he stated some roads were making were based on the capital or upon the value of the property, and I think the gentleman stated they were based upon earnings. I do not think the gentleman intended to say that——

Mr. DILLON. With certain deductions.

Mr. SNYDER. That they were based upon the earnings. It must have been either based upon the capital or upon the value of the property. I do not see how it could be based upon the earnings.

Mr. DILLON. It is based upon the earnings after certain deductions are made, so as to get net earnings. It would, of course, be upon the stock or book value. Another reason why these properties should be turned back at the earliest possible moment is to protect this Government in time of peace. In my judgment every railroad company in this country would be glad if this Government might continue this fast and loose policy for say three or four or five years, because it gives the railroad companies $200,000,000 more than they ought to have. They are not anxious for a limit; they do not want a limit. They want to continue in Government operation, so that they may make still greater sums of money. So in order to protect the Government and in order to protect the people, let us turn back these roads at the very earliest possible date whenever the emergency of war ceases. By doing so we will be protecting the Treasury, and it will give us ample time to determine the future policy of the Government.

By all means, both moral and legal, and for the protection of the Government, these roads ought to go back whenever the emergency ceases, because then the necessity ceases. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COADY].

Mr. COADY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on the 28th of last December the President of the United States, in pursuance of the power previously conferred upon him by the Congress, took possession and control of the railroad systems of the country, including the water transportation companies which are owned or controlled by them.

It was the most revolutionary economic action in the history of this country; but that such action was necessary is not open to dispute. The officials of the roads themselves approved the act taken by the President, knowing that it was rendered imperative by the breakdown of their roads and their inability to give the service that was expected of them or to meet the unusual demands made upon them by conditions growing out of the war.

I do not intend at this time to discuss the reasons for such failure, although I want to say that in my judgment it was due to a condition produced by what I might term a maximum of regulation and a minimum of increase in rates. We have not been fair to the railroads.

The New York Times, in an editorial published November 8, 1917, said that in all the annals of our national waste and extravagance there is nothing to compare with our mistreatment of our railways, now recoiling upon ourselves. Now that the operation of these transportation systems is under Federal control, we should see that their owners are justly compensated for the use thereof, and I believe the bill now before this body gives them justice.

I intend, in the time allotted to me, to comment only on two features of the bill—section 14, making provision for the return of the railroads to their owners after the war, and that portion of section 11 that safeguards the existing laws or powers of the States in relation to taxation. These provisions were not in the original bill, but were added by the committee, one by a vote of 15 to 6 and the other by a unanimous vote.

I not only believe that the railroads should be returned to their owners after the war, but I believe a definite date should be fixed when the Government operation of them shall cease. This bill fixes the time to be two years after the final ratification of the treaty of peace, which will mean at least three years after the cessation of hostilities. Surely this will give the Government ample time to meet the new problems that will arise and to so adjust things that the return of those vast properties to their owners can be made without producing the chaos and speculation that some people fear may ensue.

One of those who appeared before our committee and approved a time limit feared that there might be a deadlock in some future Congress over some measure affecting the roads, and said, "How many times has there been a deadlock between the House and the Senate, or the Congress and the President, in the past 25 years?" My answer to that is that such instances were very few and were infinitesimally small compared with the number of measures that were passed and approved.

Are we to be governed by the exception or the rule?

This same gentleman, however, later on in his testimony, was a little more trustful of Congress, for he said that there is a belief on the part of investors that Congress can be trusted to deal with this problem fairly.

Mr. Speaker, Congress can be trusted to deal fairly and justly in this matter, and it will do so.

If, after the termination of the war and the expiration of the time limit fixed in this bill, conditions will be such as to render necessary the extension of the time of Government control, is there anyone here who doubts that such action will be promptly taken and the needed laws passed? To think otherwise would be a reflection on the patriotism of Congress.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. COADY. I will yield.

Mr. DILLON. Suppose when such an extension bill had been passed that the Executive vetoed it?

Mr. COADY. Then the responsibility will be the Executive's and not that of Congress, and I have too much faith in the patriotism of some future President of the United States and the present Executive to believe he would veto a proposition of that kind.

Mr. DILLON. Then, it would take two-thirds to get away from your proposition in that event.

Mr. COADY. There need be no fear that Congress will hesitate to take prompt action when the necessity for it arises. The history of this Congress and a record of its achievements are proof of this assertion.

The position of those who are charged with the responsibility of administering this law, and who do not favor a time limit, seems to me to be this: They are unwilling to trust this Congress or a future one, yet they ask us to trust them. We do trust them and we want them to trust us.

When Mr. Anderson, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, appeared before our committee he was questioned as to the effect the passage of this act would have on the power of the States and their political subdivisions to tax railroad property. He answered, it was a very pertinent inquiry, and that he was not prepared at that time to say that it would or would not deprive the States of such power, or limit it, or otherwise affect it.

Subsequently, he asserted that he was sure the taking over and control of the roads by the Government would not impair their rights, and submitted a number of authorities in support of his assertion.

There is a doubt in my mind about this, and all the other members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I believe, entertain similar doubts.

This being the case, we thought we should have affirmative propositions to this effect in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. COADY. Yes, sir; I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Take, for example, the State of Illinois. That State in its early history granted a charter to the Illinois Central Railroad Co. One of the conditions of the grant was that it would be given certain public lands owned by the State. Another condition was that it should pay 7 per cent on its gross receipts into the treasury of the State during its existence. If there was any question about the right of the State to collect this tax, then certainly there ought to be affirmative action in this bill protecting the right of the State to the revenues it derives from this source.

Mr. COADY. I have thought that from the outset.

The only objection I have heard made against it is that it will be an invitation to the States and municipalities to impose additional and unfair taxation upon the railroads. This is a reflection on the taxing power of the States and municipalities, to which I am unwilling to subscribe, and which I resent as a reflection upon the integrity of such powers.

Mr. MASON. Is there any objection on the part of the committee to this affirmative action proposition?

Mr. COADY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, and I think I will be borne out by the members of the committee, that the vote was unanimous in favor of some affirmative proposition in the bill.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad is free from taxation. Does this or does it not bring it under taxation?

Mr. COADY. That is a matter of contract, and of course we could not impair the obligation of a contract.

Mr. LINTHICUM. According to some one speaking here the other day, we could.

Mr. COADY. I will say to my colleague that I had that in mind when I first suggested it to the committee, or rather asked Mr. Anderson questions along that line. I was apprehensive some bad results might flow to the State of Maryland and other States in the matter of taxation.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COADY. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. In the case cited by my colleague from Illinois, Mr. MADDEN, there was a contract consideration whereby this corporation received a large amount of public land to be relieved from other taxation and to pay all of their taxes in the shape of a percentage on its gross earnings into the State treasury. Now, that is largely the source of revenue of the State of Illinois, and the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that Congress has power to impair the obligation of a contract.

Mr. COADY. There might be some danger of losing that without an affirmative proposition in this bill protecting the powers of the States to tax railroad property.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr Chairman; I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SNOOK], a member of the committee.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the short time allotted me I want to discuss only two or three of the propositions contained in this bill, and at the outset of what I have to say I want to express the idea that I have never yet studied any question that has given me so much trouble as this legislation.

When you stop to consider that the value of the property we are legislating about approaches the vast sum of $18,000,000,000; that it involves a railroad mileage of more than 260,000 miles, more than all the railroads of Europe combined; when you stop to think that more than 600,000 people are interested in the stocks and bonds of these railroads, besides a vast number of savings banks and insurance companies, you will see that your committee was laboring under very great difficulty in trying to bring before this House a measure that would be just to the people and at the same time be just to the persons who were interested in this great amount of property.

Now, I wish to be fair in my consideration of this proposition. It seems to me that sometimes men who approach a question in which a corporation is involved come to it with a prejudiced notion or a prejudged idea to start with, either on the side of the corporation or on the side of the people who, they say, have been robbed by the corporation.

I was very much interested in the discussion of this subject by my colleague from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS]. Now, of course, it is well understood by everybody that there have been very many, many abuses in the conduct of the railroad systems of this country in the past, and anybody who has studied this question at all is of the opinion that there should be some way in which such episodes as the reorganization and exploitation of the Rock Island and of the New Haven Railroads could be avoided in the future. But I want my colleague and gentlemen of the committee to remember that it is not only the railroads that are exploited, but all through our business life we find men investing their money in corporations and taking advantage of the investments of their friends and exploiting these corporations to the disadvantage of the people of the country. And I want to say that I have not reached the position where I am willing to say that there are not men in America, the greatest country in the world, that are not big enough and broad enough and honest enough to look after the investments in the railroads of this country, large as they may be, and to administer them honestly and efficiently and safely. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. I call the gentleman's attention to the important difference, however, that where men exploit and rob private corporations belonging to individuals they are sent to the penitentiary. Why do you not bring in legislation that will do the same with the railroad managers?

Mr. SNOOK. Well, that should be done, but I have not time to discuss that question with my friend from Ohio. I want to discuss the proposition now pending before the House. I want to say a few words on that and not on the subject the gentleman refers to.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS] made a very lengthy and luminous argument to this House and tried to distinguish and did distinguish between Government ownership and the control which will be exercised under this measure, and left the impression, I think, upon this House—at least, he did leave the impression upon my mind—the impression that it would be right, that it would be just, that it would be fair for the American Congress and the executive officers of this country to take over this vast property under governmental control under the guise that it was a war necessity—because it has taken it over under an act providing it could be done only as a war necessity—and then to keep that property under governmental control for 8 or 10 or 12 years after the war had passed to experiment with the property that these men owned, in order to find out whether or not this measure would be the best that could be put into effect in times of peace. I am not able to have my mind go to the extent of believing that that is the thing that this Congress ought to do, and I call the gentleman's attention to this fact, which it seems to me he overlooked, that while this is a bill for governmental control, it is a bill which guarantees to the stockholders of the railroads of this country a return which is the equivalent of the average which they have earned for the last three years.

I do not believe that I could bring my mind to sanction a law that in times of peace would take over the railroads of this country, this vast property, and guarantee them a return such as is guaranteed under this bill. I willingly do it now. I am glad to join with the Executive in carrying out this proposition as a war measure, because I have seen in this Congress on both sides of the House men standing side by side with no other purpose in their hearts than to carry out this war to a successful issue and make every sacrifice that may be necessary. I do not believe that a majority of this House or a majority of the other body would be willing in times of peace to take over these great properties and guarantee to the people who own them this return in time of peace.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In that connection I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if there was any evidence before the committee of the aggregate income accruing from all the railroads of the United States throughout this three-year period?

Mr. SNOOK. Oh, yes. It aggregates a little over 5 per cent on the stocks as returned. Yes; we had a large amount of evidence on that subject.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SNOOK. I will be glad to.

Mr. MADDEN. Does that cover all the railroads—those that are not to be taken over as well as those that are to be?

Mr. SNOOK. That was the average of all the railroads making returns through the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was that on the basis of the capital stock?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes; that was on the basis of the capital stock.

Mr. MADDEN. So that the short-line railroads—so many hundreds of them—will not be taken over, but the average earnings of the roads that are to be taken under the control of the United States during the period of the war would be guaranteed a much greater return on their capital than 5 per cent?

Mr. SNOOK. It will be somewhat increased, but not as largely as the gentleman thinks.

Speaking on that subject, since my attention is called to it, I think I am myself as largely interested in that short-line question as any man in Congress. I have three of these short lines in my district. I would like the Members to have a clear idea on that subject. Take, for instance, one of the railroads that is in my district. It is 130 miles long. It was built some 12 or 15 years ago. It goes through a very rich agricultural district, but starting at a town of not very large size, and having its terminus at Fort Wayne, Ind., with its short length it was never able to earn a dividend or a return upon the stock, and it is now in the hands of a receiver.

It is typical of 500 or 600 of the short-line railroads of the country. I have arranged that it present its case to the Director General so that it may be determined whether or not its service would be such during the war that it should be taken over. The question that presents itself to this Congress is, Does the Congress wish to take over all of these short-line railroads? Do you wish to put that burden upon the Government and guarantee them a return that will make a profit to their stockholders? Can the Government afford to do that, if the Director General and the people who are looking after the conduct of this war say they are not a necessity in carrying on the war? That is the question that presents itself to the Congress; although we have gone just as far as it is possible to go, and after this bill was first drawn and placed in the hands of the committee an amendment was adopted and placed in the bill, which I do not have before me; which provides, in substance, that all of the routings that the short-line railroads which are not taken over can secure shall be observed by the Director General, and if it shall be necessary for the Director General in carrying out the purposes of the war, or in transporting war facilities, to take any of the freight away from these short lines that has been routed over them, it shall be his duty, in so far as possible, to compensate these roads by diverting freight from other roads over these short lines.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. SNOOK. Just a minute, and then I will. The railroad managers and the people who own the railroads said to us before the committee—and it was one of the things that was brought out in the evidence—that one of the valuable assets of a railroad is the right to solicit business. That had never occurred to me before; but a railroad is a business just like any other concern, and I think it was the president of the Southern Pacific, Mr. Kruttschnitt, who said that one of the most valuable assets that the railroads possessed was the privilege of soliciting business. So, you see, while these railroads are not taken over, we leave them the right to enjoy all the privileges they had before this governmental control came into existence, and also give them the privilege of still soliciting the business which belonged to other roads; and of course when the large railroads are taken over, in a very large measure, these people who are employed as solicitors will be dispensed with. That is one of the economies they expect to work out with the governmental control of railroads.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there anything in the bill pending, reported by the Interstate Commerce Committee, which compels the Director General of Railroads to make joint rates with these short lines? If there is not, I beg to say that it may discriminate to a very great extent and to the detriment of many communities through which the short lines run.

Mr. SNOOK. I think it may be fairly inferred from the amendment which the committee adopted, to which I have already referred, which makes it the duty of the Director General whenever he takes away from any of these railroads the privilege that they had, of freight being routed over them, to reroute the freight over them that would naturally go over the other lines. I would say that that would imply that he had the right to fix joint rates. And I will say further to my friend from Illinois, of course it is impossible to cover all of the details in any one of these bills; but if the gentleman could go into this matter as we have he would find out that it is the intention of the Director General—which I think is a good one in carrying out this law—to disturb the present arrangement as little as possible. That is to say, the present owners of the railroads, with their present management, are to be left in control, and only where it is an imperative necessity to carry on the business to better advantage or to do something that may tend to help us in the control of the war will this management be interfered with.

Mr. DEWALT. In order that the gentleman may be entirely accurate the wording of the amendment of which he speaks is this:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the routing instructions over and the traffic arrangements of such railroads.

Mr. SNOOK. Traffic arrangements?

Mr. DEWALT. Traffic arrangements.

Mr. SNOOK. I thank my colleague for calling my attention to it.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it be obligatory upon the Director General under that language to prorate the rates between the short lines and the trunk lines?

Mr. SNOOK. Well, yes; I think so.

Mr. FIELDS. Is there any provision in the bill to protect the short-line roads against discrimination in the supply of rolling stock? For instance, if there is a car shortage will the Government contribute all its supplies to the roads that it is operating, or will it give the short-line road its proportionate share that it would be entitled to under ordinary business conditions?

Mr. SNOOK. There is nothing in the bill along that line. That is a matter of detail that I imagine will be carried out very much as the present management of furnishing cars is being carried out by the car-service board at this time. They are trying to obviate all these difficulties to which I have called attention.

Mr. FIELDS. That is one of the most important features for the short-line roads, that they may be permitted to get rolling stock.

Mr. SNOOK. I imagine that would be a matter of detail to be taken care of by the Director General in the management of the railroads. We know now that the car-service board are trying to take care of that detail and was before the railroads were taken over. Take the railroad to which I have just referred: I had that question up with the car-service board about furnishing railroad cars, and I found to my amazement that this little railroad only owned 10 freight cars, although several million dollars are invested in it. The car-service board had made an order on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad to furnish 100 freight cars to this little railroad, which serves the agricultural people to carry their stuff to market.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOOK. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. A few minutes ago the gentleman stated that the short-line railroads would be permitted to continue soliciting. Does he mean that it is the intention of the Director to discontinue the solicitors of freight on the large lines?

Mr. SNOOK. I can not answer the gentleman on that point. That was discussed in the hearings before the committee, and I thought, from what I heard from different sources, that while that might not be entirely done away with, they intended to work some economies along that line.

Mr. SNYDER. I wish to say that, in my judgment, it might be well enough to do away with some of them, but it would be a very serious situation to do away with all of them, because they not only solicit but help the shipper to route his stuff. Some might say that he would route it over his own line; but even if he did the solicitor helps get the product to its destination, and that is what we need to-day in railroading more than anything else.

Mr. SNOOK. That was one of the matters brought up before the committee. I think it was Mr. Kruttschnitt, of the Union Pacific, who showed that was a valuable asset—that the service rendered by the solicitor was not only to secure the business but to give instructions to shippers in regard to routing the freight.

Mr. SNYDER. It is a very important part of the service.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to ask if the Director General is soon to order all the short lines to stop solicitation?

Mr. SNOOK. I am not able to answer that question.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I think that was brought up before our committee, and I wanted to know if he had withdrawn it.

Mr. SNOOK. We could not object if the railroads are not taken over or if they are to be surrendered by the President; it would still give power to them to solicit.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. In relation to the provision—

That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the routing instructions over and the traffic arrangements of such railroads—

does the committee construe the term "traffic arrangement" to cover a division of the income from freight transportation?

Mr. SNOOK. I think that would fairly be the construction.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is not the usual and ordinary sort of a contract.

Mr. SNOOK. That provision was drawn by some of the people friendly to the short-line railroads. When it comes to the technical meaning I am not able to inform the gentleman.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The question of the retention of the railroads after the termination of the war is a very important one. The roads were taken over under the act of August 29, 1916, by the President as a war measure, and we gave the power to the President as a war measure. As the bill was reported, it provides that Federal control shall continue during the continuance of the war or until Congress shall thereafter order otherwise. Was it the opinion of the committee, from information gathered, that by a simple decree of that sort the railroads could be continued indefinitely in the hands of the Government after being taken as a war measure?

Mr. SNOOK. I do not quite catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I know the bill has been modified, but as an original draft it provided that the ownership or management or Federal control should continue for and during the period of the war and until Congress shall thereafter order otherwise. Was it the opinion of the committee that they might remain indefinitely in the control of the Government unless otherwise ordered?

Mr. SNOOK. I think so; that was the argument.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Having once taken them as a war measure, it was the opinion of the committee that they could be held indefinitely?

Mr. SNOOK. The gentleman is referring to the constitutional question?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. That was fully argued before the committee, up one side and down the other. The committee, as has many other committees in the House, has many constitutional lawyers, and I notice that when any of these questions come up we have a superfluity of constitutional representatives.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, may I make a statement to the gentleman along the line that he is talking about?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. MASON. Upon the question of the solicitation of business——

Mr. SNOOK. I will ask the gentleman to defer that for a moment as I want first to answer this other question.

Mr. MASON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought he had finished.

Mr. SNOOK. It was contended before the committee that inasmuch as these railroads had been taken over as a war measure under the act to which the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] has referred, that they were taken over and held under the war power conferred by the Constitution. On the other hand we had gentlemen who appeared before the committee who advanced the argument that under the commerce clause of the Constitution the Government would have full power to take these railroads over in time of peace, and if they were held after the conclusion of the war, although they had been taken over under the notion that it was a war measure, still the Supreme Court would be inclined to say that inasmuch as the Government had the power to do so, the possession of the roads could be continued in the Government as long as Congress might wish.

Mr. MADDEN. Inasmuch as the President made the declaration in accordance with the law under which he took them over, would he not be bound by that?

Mr. SNOOK. I understand; but I am giving both sides of the argument. I want to give expression to this thought: That the very argument that has arisen upon this question is one of the strongest reasons, to my mind, why there should be a time limit fixed in the bill within which the railroads should be returned to their owners. It occurs to me that if there are two schools of thought upon this subject and there is no time limit fixed in the bill within which the railroads shall be returned to their owners after the war should end, and the owners of these railroads should be dissatisfied with the Government management and control, or with the amount of compensation they have been receiving, or anything of that kind, they would immediately go into the courts and begin litigation to secure the return of their property, and to my mind I must confess, although I am a lawyer and have never followed any other business, there could be no disaster that could befall the people of this country that would be so great as to plunge this great industry, the stockholders and the employees, into a litigation with the Government upon any question involved in the taking over of the property. I believe it would disturb labor conditions, and, more than that, I feel convinced that it would disturb the stock market and the value of the bonds and stocks of these railroads, and if the country were plunged into a litigation on this subject or upon any other vital subject connected with this bill it would bring on a panic, because the amount of property involved is so great. I believe it could not be otherwise.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is talking about the effect on labor. I would like to ask for information upon the subject of how labor is to be affected with respect to the employers' liability laws of the various States and of the Nation now, whether they are to come under the Federal compensation act?

Mr. SNOOK. They come under the Federal liability act. When this bill was first drawn it contained a provision placing all of the railroad employees under a Federal compensation act. It provided for Federal compensation, but that was discussed fully in the committee, and there were very grave questions as to the constitutionality of that law. No one seemed to want it. The railroads are dissatisfied with it and the people who are employed by the railroads are dissatisfied with it; and the committee, having thought the question over, believed it would be the best thing to leave the employees in the situation in which they now find themselves.

Those who oppose the provisions of section 1, relating to the fixing of the standard return and defining and limiting its amount, assume that if this section as it now stand becomes law every agreement entered into between the President and carriers will allow compensation to the carrier at the highest rate permissible under the act.

It is said that the President suggested such rate in his proclamation assuming control of the systems of transportation, and therefore it may be definitely predicted that this standard will be applied in every case. Whenever one advances such a claims he loses sight of the fact that while the original bill as introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee on January 14, 1918, seems to have been drafted with this avowed purpose, as the language in this respect is as follows:

At an annual rate as nearly as may be to its average net railway operating income for the three years ending June 30, 1917.

Yet the bill has been amended in this respect by the committee so as to read as follows:

It shall receive as just compensation not exceeding an annual sum equivalent as nearly as may be to the average annual operating income for the three years ended June 30, 1917.

It may have been the intention of those who originally considered the matter to limit the power of the President in making an agreement in all cases to the single standard of the average operating income for the three years named. But it will be observed that the bill as amended enlarges the power of the President and authorizes him to make an agreement for compensation at any rate that he may deem proper, so long as it does not exceed this average.

I submit therefore that we are not warranted in assuming that those in control will ignore the right which this amendment confers and in all cases fix the compensation at the maximum rate named in the bill.

Moreover, we must remember that we are not now settling a policy that is to be permanently followed.

The Government has taken over the use of the railroad systems for the term of the war. Under the Constitution the owners have a right to compensation for the use of their property.

If the owners are unable to agree with the Government upon the amount of the rental they shall receive, then they have a right to go into the courts to have that amount fixed. If, therefore, the Government is not in a position to offer them a sum that nearly approaches the amount they have been earning under private management, it stands to reason that they will refuse to make an agreement and choose rather to exercise the right they have to submit their claims to a court for determination.

This presents a practical question. Shall we leave the bill as it is now drawn and under the provisions of which it is reasonably certain that the Government will reach an agreement with nearly all of the railroads, or shall we take the risk of inserting new and novel provisions which the owners of the railroads are not likely to agree to?

To my mind there is nothing that is likely to be so harmful in the end to the Government, the public, and the owners of the railroads as to frame the terms of this bill so as to preclude or render doubtful the settlement of these claims for rental through an agreement between the Government and the owners of the railroads.

All of the amendments to section 1 that I have yet heard proposed take away from the owners of the railroads a very substantial part of that which they have been receiving for many years. It seems to me that if any of such proposals are incorporated in the bill it will cause a large majority of the railroads to refuse to agree upon a fair rental and lead them to go into the courts for a settlement of their claims.

It is proposed to leave the management of the railroads so far as possible in the hands of the owners to be exercised by the men now in control. Certainly this will be so as to all the details touching maintenance and operation. Everyone who appeared before the committee conceded that this was the only wise course to pursue.

What then will be the effect upon the efficiency of the operation of the roads if those who have the details in charge and who are to be held responsible for success or failure are at the same time engaged in conducting a contest at law against the Government to determine a fact as vital as that of settling what rental they shall receive for the use of their property?

The extent of the success of the proposed plan of operation of the railroads depends in my opinion largely upon whether or not we so frame this bill under consideration as to enable the Government to reach a voluntary agreement with the owners of the roads for compensation along some such plan as that proposed in section 1 of the act.

No doubt there were many reasons which led to the proposal of this plan for fixing the amount of the compensation. But no doubt the paramount one was that we were taking over the roads for the purpose of assisting in the conduct of the war and that it is necessary at this time to submerge every other purpose to that of winning the war.

Therefore it is no time to stop to engage in a dispute over matters of public policy on which the people are divided. Neither is it the time to settle the question as to whether or not the people would be best served by Government ownership of the railroads. It is our patriotic duty to avoid disputes that will involve this great industry and all the people that are interested in it as stockholders, security holders, and employees in doubt and confusion.

It is our duty, in my judgment, through this governmental control to unify and coordinate the different systems of railroads and inaugurate such changes in the management and control as will assist in winning the war and best serve the people of the country during the war period, leaving as large a share of control in the hands of the owners as is consistent with these purposes.

All the proposed schemes that look to a radical change in the management or propose entirely new and different rates of compensation, figured on a basis entirely different from that which has prevailed under private management, it seems to me lose sight of the fact that we are engaged in a war that requires and demands the exercise of all the energy we can bring to bear and admits of as little dissension and dispute as is possible.

No one will be so bold as to claim that the proposed basis is entirely accurate and furnishes an exact test of the amount the carriers would earn during the war period or that it is an exact test under all the circumstances of what is just. But I do maintain that it is based on experience; that it is plainly understood and can be easily applied; that it is not likely to bring out a dispute between the owners and the Government, and has the added virtue of meeting the approval of a large majority of the owners of railroad securities and the public. This plan of providing compensation by agreement is wisely supplemented by paragraph 3 of section 1, which provides for taking care of depreciation and maintenance and for the adjustment at the conclusion of governmental control of all claims that may be held, either by the Government or the carriers, for money that has been expended by either on account of maintenance and depreciation.

There has also been much discussion and criticism of the terms of section 11. It is contended by many that the President should not have authority to initiate and fix rates, but that this power should be left to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The act of August 29, 1916, under which the railroads were taken over, is as follows:

The President, in time of war, is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation, or any part thereof, and to utilize the same, to the exclusion as far as may be necessary of all other traffic thereon, for the transfer or transportation of troops, war materials and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable.

The language of this act, conferring on the President the power to take possession and assume control of the carriers for such purposes connected with the emergency as he may deem needful or desirable, to my mind clearly implies that if, in his judgment, it is needful or desirable to effect this purpose intended to be carried out by the act he is empowered to initiate or fix rates or to do such other things to effect such control as he may deem necessary.

If this is not so, the authority granted is futile. Those who oppose giving him this power assume that the functions heretofore exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission are to be entirely taken away and that those who are to exercise this control and management on behalf of the Government will undertake to change established rates and practices, without regard to what has heretofore been done and in disregard of the opinion of members of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That this conclusion is not correct and that any such action is far from the thought of the present Director General is shown by his testimony before the committee, for in discussing this subject there he gives expression to the following thought:

Mr. DECKER. Mr McAdoo, there was one question that I wanted to ask with relation to the question of fixing rates. I would like to have your views as to the necessity and the wisdom of the Director General of Railroads having the right to fix the rates. I mean transportation rates.

Mr. MCADOO. I think that so long as the railroads are, by authority of Congress, in the possession of the President and are being operated by the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States for the war purpose, he is bound to have a paramount control of the properties, so that he may exercise that power in any way that the public interest or any emergency that may arise may require.

Now, as to the rate-making power, I think the President undoubtedly has the power to control rates during the time of Federal possession, under the present law. I think, on the other hand, that that power ought not to be exercised—and I am sure it will not be exercised—except in such cases as may be necessary in the public interest. I think it would be very unwise for the Federal Government to undertake through the Director General of Railroads—who merely represents the President in this control—to pass upon all the rates in the country, either de novo or as questions may arise concerning them. I think that the agency of the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to be employed, and that it ought to hear these questions from time to time as the public interest requires, and that the views of the Interstate Commerce Commission or their judgment as to what ought to be done in the circumstances ought to prevail, and I think would undoubtedly be permitted to prevail, except in so far as it might be wise for the President to modify or to change them. In other words, I feel that the commission ought to act in an advisory capacity while the President is in control of the railroads, and that its advice and suggestions about rates will be of great value.

Now, that applies to interstate rates. As to intrastate rates, I think that the State commissions ought to continue to consider such questions as they rise. Innumerable questions affecting local conditions are coming up from time to time, and they ought to hear them and pass upon them; and so long as their views and judgment do not run counter to the common interest, they will be regarded and accepted just as heretofore.

I had a conference with, I think, about 20 of the representatives of the State commissions recently, and I told them that I thought that they ought to go forward just as usual—and, in fact, the President's proclamation so provides—and hear cases and exercise their powers as they have heretofore done, always, of course, with the understanding that the President has the power to override any decision they may make when he thinks it necessary to do so in the public interest.

The State commissions have jurisdiction over many other questions besides intrastate rates. They have the right to pass upon local questions like the construction of a switch to an industrial plant, sidetracks, and things of that kind.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And crossings?

Mr. MCADOO. Yes. I think all those powers ought to be exercised by them as heretofore, subject to the Federal control.

Mr. ESCH. How about the power granting to many commissions the right to issue certificates of convenience and necessity with reference to stock and bond issues?

Mr. MCADOO. I think they ought to be permitted to continue that. Of course, I should feel that it was necessary to be consulted about it. During this war, and especially because the Government is very vitally concerned in the expenditure of new capital in the country, we must have as much control of such questions as we possibly can in order to carry forward the Government's own financial operations.

Returning to the rate-making power, so far as State commissions are concerned, as to intrastate rates, suppose that the President had no control over rates during this period of Federal control, and that the Congress of the United States had authorized a guarantee to the carriers. It would be within the powers of the State commissions to alter rates to such an extent as to enforce deficits upon the Federal Treasury. I do not mean to insinuate that they would abuse that power, or that they would use it for the purpose of creating such deficits, but it would leave in their hands the power to do it, which, if exercised, would in effect be taking money out of the Federal Treasury without any appropriation having been made by Congress. I think that Congress can not place that sort of power in the hands of any State authority or anybody else. There again, however, I think there will be no difficulty about harmonious relations with the various State commissions. They have given me every evidence of a desire to cooperate, and I am quite sure that they will.

This idea expressed by the Director General is carried out in the language of the bill, for in section 11 we find this provision:

Until and except so far as the President shall from time to time otherwise order, the rates, fares, charges, classification, regulations, and practices of carriers under Federal control shall, during the period of Federal control, continue to be and to be determined as hitherto.

It is therefore plain that there is to be no change in the present method of fixing rates, except in exceptional cases and then only when an emergency arises making such course necessary.

Heretofore all rates have been fixed under law on the competitive theory. During the period of the war, while the railroads are under Federal control, it will be necessary, no doubt, in many cases to ignore this basis of arriving at the proper rate, and that line of railroad is to be used by the persons exercising governmental control that can be most effectually utilized.

In making use of this changed method it occurs to me if we are to derive the benefit that was sought by assuming control of the carriers, it will be necessary at times to change without delay some rate, charge, classification, or practice that heretofore prevailed.

I understand that in giving this authority to the President we are granting great power, but these are no ordinary times and it is no ordinary purpose that we are trying to carry out. I believe that it is well understood that we took over the control and management of the railroads for the very reason that there was no one who had the authority to speak for all the roads. Therefore, if we are to make a success of that control, if we are to accomplish what we set out to do, there must be no division of authority, no opportunity for dispute and delay. Necessarily there must be some one head which has the authority to speak the last word on every detail that is involved in this matter.

During the last year we have heard much of the weakness that comes from division of authority; we have heard much of it in connection with the conduct of the war; if we listen to the counsel of those who oppose this provision of the bill, in my judgment we will make the same mistake that has been made so often and defeat the very purpose we set out to accomplish.

When the bill was first introduced it carried no provision fixing a definite time after the conclusion of the war in which the railroads were to be returned to their owners. There are many who still think that no such time should be fixed in the law. I listened carefully to all the arguments before the committee on this subject, and I have come to the conclusion that there should be a limit fixed in the law within which this property is to be turned back to its owner.

By taking this course we make it plain to everyone that this is intended as a war measure.

It is contended that inasmuch as the carriers have been placed under governmental control that this fact should necessarily be taken advantage of to settle all questions agitated by the public concerning the ownership and control of the railroad systems of the country. That the theory upon which they have been operated and controlled should be changed; some assume that the only remedy is Government ownership, and that now is the time to put it into effect; others contend that this will not do, but that we must reverse the policy that we have been following and institute government control, with all opportunity for competition between systems eliminated.

A majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce believe that this is a war measure and that it should be so confined in its scope of operation. They are of the opinion that it is not the proper time for a dispute and that all disagreements, as far as possible, should be eliminated.

They believe that we should all get together and make the present management a success and thereby aid in carrying on the war to a successful issue, and leave these disputed questions to be settled after the war has been won. It is argued by some that under the Constitution we can not hold the roads, under the authority of the act under which they were taken over, for an indefinite period after the close of the war.

I shall not undertake to discuss this question or to hazard an opinion as to its soundness. However, I believe that it will be conceded by everyone that the question at least is open to dispute. If this is correct and no definite time is fixed in the bill for the return of the railroads, does it not follow that as soon as the war is ended all of the owners who are not satisfied with conditions will bring suit to recover possession of their property?

If this should happen, conditions would become unsettled and the value of railroad stocks and securities would be depressed to such an extent as might lead to a panic. The principal argument advanced before the committee for not fixing a time limit in the bill was that the fixing of such a time would disturb the security market and work a great hardship on the people who owned railroad stocks.

I am free to say that I have never been able to appreciate the force of this argument. To undertake the management with a fixed program that all can understand to my mind means stability, while to begin the management with an uncertain and indefinite program and to continue control without letting those interested know what the limit will be means confusion and difficulty. If the roads are to be returned to their owners, I believe that Congress should fix a definite time in which that should be done. To do this now at the very beginning of control will eliminate uncertainty and have tendency to stabilize securities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield me five minutes more?

Mr. SIMS. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to ask if on page 12 of the bill that is not provided for, where the bill provides that they shall be subject to all laws and liabilities, whether arising under State or Federal laws?

Mr. SNOOK. I was just coming to that question; and that is a thing that the committee should understand. There was very grave doubt in the minds of some members of the committee whether or not the bill as originally drawn protected the rights of the employees in the event they should receive an injury and bring suit against the company. So an amendment was offered to the original draft of the bill, and I do not have in mind the exact wording, but it was drawn by one of the best lawyers on the committee, and it now carefully and thoroughly protects the employees of the railroads in all the rights they had before the railroads were taken over.

Mr. MASON. May I be permitted to make a suggestion to my colleague in regard to the question of the solicitation of business? Every day I have had complaints coming to my desk from at least one city in the State of Illinois where there are competing lines from shippers that since the Government has taken over the roads that they are unable to get the assistance they formerly had in the matter of routing their freight; in other words, they lack the spirit of accommodation they had before. That is one fact I wanted to lay before the gentleman as a member of the committee.

Mr. SNOOK. I am glad to have the gentleman bring that question out, and this should be brought to the attention of the Director General and the people who have the management of the railroads. I believe it is the wish—I know I have talked with him a little upon the subject—I believe it is the wish of the Director General and the persons having control of these railroads to give efficient service.

Now, I want to say this in conclusion: I got far away from what I started out to say, but I want to conclude as I began, and that is along the line that I have not lost faith yet in the railroads of America. It has been said a great many times in this debate that the railroads have broken down and that is the reason for this governmental control. There are two reasons to my mind for this governmental control, and it is not a fact that the railroads of this country have broken down. I believe they are the best railroads and the best managed railroads in the world. I have traveled a little in our country and upon the railroads in Europe, and I want to say to you it seemed to me like getting back home when I came to America and got on one of our good, old railroad trains in this country, just like getting back home. This thought I want to leave with the committee; I do not know what other men may think, but I want to see the largest field left to the American people for human endeavor that can be left. I do not believe the railroads have broken down. I believe that the reason for taking over these railroads was the cause that has been brought to the attention of Congress very many times, the congestion of freight at the eastern terminals on account of trying to run all the freight of this country over certain routes, and the fact that the Government was necessarily employing all the capital of this country in making loans for the conduct of the war so that the railroad companies could not have an opportunity to float their securities. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not like the proposition of the Government taking over the railroads at this time; I think it is a mistake. I want to see this bill amended in some respects, but I will vote for the bill, because I am like the man in the hollow log that had a bear by the tail, that it was not wise to let go at that time. [Laughter.] We have taken over the railroads. We are in the midst of a great war. Consequently we must support the Government in everything it wants that is necessary to carry on this war successfully. I am unalterably opposed to Government ownership of railroads, and the gist of my remarks will be upon that subject.

THE WORLD'S EXPERIENCE IN GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILROADS.

In an article prepared by Richard Hoadley Tingley, in the Santa Fe Magazine, he states:

Of the 76 political organizations that go to make up the independent nations and colonial dependencies of the world, 44 already have declared themselves, as a matter of practical politics, as being in favor of complete or partial nationalization of their railways by taking over and operating some considerable portion of the mileage within their borders. In the balance, 32, all the railroads are still privately owned. Conspicuous in this latter class are the democratic Governments of Great Britain and the United States.

I believe I am correct in stating that among the people of the United States who favor Government ownership of the country's railroads, the socialistic element is strong and predominates.

Martin A. Knapp, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, stated, in 1902:

For the Government of the United States to acquire the 200,000 miles already constructed, undertake to conduct their vast operations by direct agency, and to extend the service with needful rapidity is a project of such colossal import as to incline us to place it quite outside the range of probability.

Some 10 years later, when the railroad mileage had been largely increased in the United States, Franklin K. Lane, also then a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, said:

No one who has had experience in governmental affairs will be bold enough to say that the Government of the United States could now operate the 250,000 miles of railways with as much satisfaction to the people as the railroads themselves are now being administered.

These were men of experience in railroad matters, and statements made by them should command the attention and respect of thinking men.

I wish to review, briefly, the history of the government-ownership idea by giving comparisons and statistics in the management of the government-owned railroads in the various countries of the world where the same has been and is being tried.

It is probably not very well known by the general public that this country has had quite an extended experience in building, owning, and operating railroads.

During the early days of railroading in the United States the "sovereign State" was considered the only medium strong enough or sufficiently well qualified to cope with such large affairs. Many of the States entered the railroad field and many of them experienced quite heavy losses and great burden by taxation for the maintenance of the roads. However, out of the many hundreds of miles built and operated in the past by the various States not a single mile is now so operated—with the exception of 32 miles in Texas, used as an adjunct to its penitentiary system. This of itself would not, as it appears to me, be a very conclusive argument in favor of Government ownership of railroads.

Many in public as well as in private life have fixed opinions as to the wisdom of Government ownership of railroads; many write upon the subject of Government ownership of railroads.

My attention has been called to an article written by former Gov. Stubbs, of Kansas, published in the Saturday Evening Post of June 6, 1914.

I want to point out certain inaccuracies of the governor's statements in that article.

The Governor attempted to justify Government ownership of railroads. He made comparisons and quoted figures in support of his arguments, many of which were greatly overdrawn and inaccurate. Among other things, the Governor made the following statement:

No railroad system once taken over by the Government has ever been permanently returned to private ownership.

I wish to show how incorrect the governor was in such a statement. In the past many of the States of this country have operated railroads that are now being operated by private corporations, and statistics and history show that in no instance has State operation been successful. I quote from the Railway Library and Statistics, and the latest complete railway statistics are for the year 1916:

The North Carolina Railroad Company was incorporated in that State in 1849, and during the next few years built some 223 miles of line from Goldsboro to Charlotte. The State owned a large majority of the stock, built the road and operated it until 1871, when it was leased to the Richmond & Danville Railroad (now part of the Southern Railway). The State now derives a good yearly income from the stock which it still owns in this road. North Carolina also built and was at one time sole owner of the Western North Carolina Railroad, 185 miles, from Salisbury to the Tennessee line. This road was State owned and operated from 1875 to 1880, when it was sold to a private company and afterward passed into the hands of the Southern Railway, the State having now no interest in the ownership. North Carolina built a third road, from Goldsboro to the coast, 95 miles. This was called The Atlantic & North Carolina Railroad. The State owned (and still owns) two-thirds of the stock of this company and had absolute control of its operation from the time of its completion, about 1856, until 1904, when a 95-year lease was entered into with a private company. This lease shortly afterward became the property of the Norfolk & Southern Railroad, and since has been operated as a part of that system, the State deriving a handsome income from its stock holdings under the lease.

North Carolina presents, perhaps, the most striking example of State ownership and operation that this country affords, both in length of lines operated and length of time as well. At one time the State had more than 500 miles of operation on its hands, and for nearly half a century it operated the 95 miles from Goldsboro to the Atlantic. Since 1904 it has had no interest in these operations other than to draw its interest and dividends. That the experience of this State so far as operation is concerned was unsuccessful nobody attempts to deny. On the other hand, as a result of the retention of ownership while the lines are being operated by experienced private corporations as business enterprises, the State is receiving substantial benefit. The experience of the State of North Carolina in railroad ownership is anything but a satisfaction to that State.

And, further, the experience of the State of Missouri in railroad ownership and operation is rather a sore spot. Missourians do not like to have the subject mentioned. According to C. M. Keys, of the Wall Street Journal, this State had a hand in owning, financing, and operating several of its lines—the Hannibal & St. Joseph, the St. Louis, Iron Mountain, the Cairo & Fulton, and the Pacific Railroad. The resulting net loss was nearly $25,000,000. High finance in this border State was well understood in those early days. Mark Twain was well advised when he wrote The Gilded Age, and Gov. Stubbs, living so near Missouri, should have known about it. All these properties are now prosperous. They form integral parts of big western systems. Missouri made no mistake in selecting the lines it would own and operate, but Missouri did demonstrate, at least to its own satisfaction, that it was unprofitable for a state to become a railroad promoter.

Massachusetts tried railroading. To pierce the Berkshire Mountains with a tunnel was thought to be too expensive a task for private capital. The building of the Hoosac Tunnel, therefore, was undertaken by the State, and it was operated unsuccessfully several years. The property finally passed into the hands of the Boston & Maine Railroad.

Mr. W. F. Allen, secretary of the American Railway Association, is responsible for the statement that the Western & Atlantic Railroad, 137 miles in length, was constructed and operated by the State of Georgia and gradually became "a prolific source of loss and injury to the community that had supplied the funds for its construction." It has been operated under lease since 1870 and is now a part of the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railroad, though still owned by the State.

Further, Mr. Allen said, regarding the State ownership in Pennsylvania:

Eighty miles of railway, extending from Philadelphia to Columbia, were built by the State of Pennsylvania and operated unremuneratively by its government several years to the disgust of the people of the State. The road finally was sold to the Pennsylvania Railroad in 1857, and forms part of its original main line.

Seven million five hundred thousand dollars was paid by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. for this line, which is said to have been at least twice what it was worth, but not more than a quarter of what it had cost the State. W. B. Wilson, historian of the Pennsylvania Railway, says, in referring to this line:

The individual transporter who did not dance when the politician in charge of traffic piped was placed at a great disadvantage. It became a potent factor for corruption and reached such an extent that the transporters who would do certain things for the politicians at elections would have their tolls rebated to an extent that nearly always reached a refund of the entire amount paid. The State debt grew till bankruptcy stared the people in the face.

It is said that this railroad experience cost the State of Pennsylvania upward of $20,000,000.

Other instances of municipal bodies having taken up, built, and operated railroads might be cited, as in Cincinnati, where the city built and now owns—but has ceased to operate—the Cincinnati Southern Railroad, 338 miles in length; also, as in Texas, where a little railway, 32 miles long, was built and is to this day being operated by the State. This last example is the only case in our entire land where the State at present operates a railroad.

It seems to me, in the instances just cited, there is but little to recommend Government ownership.

The Panama Railroad, 47 miles long, now owned and operated by the Federal Government, is another instance of Government ownership. Some ten years ago the United States acquired this railroad and the steamship company as well, this being necessary to facilitate the construction of the canal. On the average, statistics show, it costs the railroads of this country about $7,700 per mile operating expenses per year. At Panama, leaving the steamship company out of the calculation, it costs rather more than $50,000 per mile. A freight rate of almost seven times the United States average is charged and collected by this road. This is Government ownership, though.

CANADA.

And quite in line with my argument that the Government can not operate railroads in this or any other country in the world so successfully or economically as they can be operated by private ownership, I want to call attention to the railroads of Canada as an example. Of the 29,233 miles of railroad in Canada in 1913 a fraction over 6 per cent was owned and operated by the Government—1,768 miles—the larger portion of this being the Intercolonial Railway, which occupies some of the best territory in Canada. While the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk, and the Canadian Northern, all privately owned and operated roads, have been giving good accounts of themselves, this property, owned and operated by the Government, seldom pays its bare operating costs, the deficit being met by a general tax. W. R. Givens, in Moody's Magazine, says that the trouble is "because it lives, moves, and has its being as a political institution."

A telegram from the American Consul at Ottawa, February 9, states as follows:

Miles of railway operated by Dominion, 4,015; taken over from Canadian Northern, not yet Government operated, 9,371; total, 13,386 miles.

Late information is to the effect that the total railway mileage in Canada at the close of 1917 was about 48,000, showing a great increase in mileage constructed in the last four years.

It has been said by advocates of government ownership in this country that such mismanagement would not happen in our country.

There is every evidence, as I shall attempt to show, that Government owned and operated railroads in this country would be the most dangerous political machine ever invented in any country in the world.

Canada, whose people and their customs and habits and conditions are quite similar to those of the people of the United States, has had experience in government ownership of railroads. While the cost of railroad construction in the United States is considerably less than the cost of construction of private-owned roads in Canada, which is shown to be $65,182 per mile, the cost of construction of Government-owned railroads in Canada is given as $99,000 per mile. A little later on I will give a complete history of the financial operations of both private and Government-owned railroads in Canada, but wish, in passing, to say for every $100 of receipts by the Government-owned railroads of Canada they paid out $102.13, while the private-owned railroads for every $100 in receipts paid out $73.94, and it must be remembered this included taxes and interest paid by the private-owned roads which run into the millions of dollars—$3,049,387, being $97 tax per mile of road owned. The Government-owned railroads for the year 1915 sustained a loss of $11,000,000, as is shown by the Bureau of Railway News and Statistics of Chicago, April 12, 1916, Bulletin No. 99, at the same time paying no taxes or interest upon the indebtedness of the roads.

Canada's annual pay roll to employees is below the pay roll of the employees of the United States.

Before the people of the United States, through their representatives in Congress, demand Government ownership of the railroads they should give most careful thought to the success or failure of government-owned roads in other countries where the system has been tried.

Mr. Givens says on the subject of Government ownership: "Each political party when out of office charges that its poor results are due to the use of the railroads for the political purposes of the party in office." This seems to be true. At any rate, the deplorable results of Government operation of the Intercolonial are too well known to require further comment. This road being of considerable length—about 1,400 miles—and operating under physical conditions so closely analogous to those existing in the United States, would seem to furnish all the object lesson necessary under the circumstances.

FRANCE.

Of all the countries of the world having government ownership of railroads, France shows the most striking example of failure. Statistics show that of something over 30,000 miles of railway in France in 1914 only a little over 5,500 miles were Government owned and operated, most of this mileage being the Western Railway of France, which serves the important western and northern Provinces and seaports and connects them with Paris. This line was taken over from the private company in 1908 and shows an increase in gross receipts, but the operating expenses and accumulated deficit from operation have also increased at an alarming pace. These statistics relate to a time prior to the outbreak of the war. Net earnings seem to be on the toboggan slide, as will be seen from the following table:

Table as shown by French statistics, in millions of francs.

	Gross earnings.	Net earnings.	Deficit.
1911	236.1	50.2	71.3

During this period, while the deficit from operation was piling up, a most deplorable condition existed in the physical operation of the property; fewer and slower passenger trains, irregular service, lack of fidelity to schedule, scarcity of freight cars, impaired roadbed, and other like ailments have affected the property; in other words, the property has become run down at the heel. In commenting on the situation, Paul Leroy Beaulieu, an eminent French economist, said in 1912:

Everyone knows the deplorable result of the management of the company of the West by the State. At the end of three years Government ownership appears to be a public calamity and a financial disaster.

A greater number of accidents occurred because of the run-down condition of the line than was the case on well-equipped railroads.

The total deficit from the operation of Government-owned railroads in France, from 1908 to 1913, was upward of $70,000,000. Yet it must be remembered this is Government ownership of railroads.

The population of France for each mile of railroad line in 1913 was 1,241, or more than three times that of the United States.

In France, in 1912, there were 25,319 miles of railroad. The average yearly wage per employee was $212.77, or 68 cents per day, or $4.08 per week of six days. The freight rate charge averaged 1.37 cents per ton-mile.

It will be remembered that the Government owns a large percentage of the railroads in France, and their financial history is such as would be most discouraging to any nation contemplating Government ownership of railroads.

The operating ratio in France between private-owned and Government-owned railroads is as follows: Private-owned railroads averaged 53.3 per cent, and increased to a maximum of 58.4 per cent in 1912 and 1913; while on Government-owned railroads the increase was from 56.4 per cent to 89.4 per cent.

On the Government-owned roads in France there were so many accidents the staff and the public became so frightened that the express trains on the main lines, already the slowest in France, were decelerated to a timing that had been abandoned as inadequate years before. The service in general was poor. While compensation for accidents under private management amounted to a loss of from four to five hundred thousand dollars per year, under Government ownership in 1913 it amounted to more than $2,000,000.

The Minister of Public Works of France publicly criticized the State administration as a "frightful fraud," and the Senate passed unanimously a resolution beginning as follows: "The deplorable situation of the State system, the insecurity and irregularity of its workings," and so forth. It is most probable that the French Senate and Minister of Public Works knew what they were talking about.

Paul Leroy Beaulieu gives the reason for the deplorable situation as follows:

In the first place, it is the abuse of formalism and red tape, with all the delays which follow, and which are directly in conflict with commercial needs; in the second place, it is lack of stability, the directors and all of the chiefs of the service change at the will of the ministers, whilst in private companies the higher personnel is maintained a long time fulfilling the same functions; next, it is the political influence which enters into the choice and advancement of the personnel; it is, lastly, lack of discipline, which also results from political influence at work.

He further states:

As for formalism and red tape, on the eve of the handing over of the railroads to the State, there were 1,525 employees in the central office. Within three years thereafter the number had increased to 2,587. The single service of the accounting general was increased by 70 persons directly after the purchase by the State, and this was due largely to political pressure and partly to excessive red tape. For example, in the Caen division in the preparation of the pay sheets, which under private ownership took 9 persons 3 days, or a total of 27 days' work, under the State administration took 12 persons six days, or a total of 72 days' work. Proportionate increases in the number of employees were made all along the line, too numerous here for me to mention. Salaried officers, 33 in number under private ownership, 99 persons under Government ownership. Increased wages to employees, increased number of employees, and increased freight and passenger charges were the results of Government ownership of railroads, which is true all over the world on Government-owned roads.

But this is Government ownership of railroads.

Under private ownership the question of fast trains is one to which careful consideration has been given all over the world. Great Britain in 1888 had greatly increased the speed of her express trains, and America promptly followed with the Empire State Express and the Atlantic City flyers. The French companies took up the challenge and put on trains from Paris to Calais and to the Belgian and Spanish frontiers and held their own with anything operating in England or America.

I have just shown that under State ownership France reduced the speed of her passenger trains because of the run-down condition of the Government-owned roads, there being no money in France to keep in good condition the roads and equipment. The only way to obtain money for the same would be by direct taxation on the people or increased freight and passenger rates. But this is Government ownership of railroads.

I wish to give here a comparison of the wages and freight rates and operating costs of railroads in several of the principal countries of the world, beginning with the United Kingdom. The latest reliable statistics in Europe obtainable are for the year 1913, and in fact in some instances prior to that time.

UNITED KINGDOM.

In 1913 the number of miles of railroad in the United Kingdom was 23,691. The average yearly pay per employee was $364.17, and figured on the basis of 313 working days per year it will be seen that the wages averaged $1.16 per day, or $6.96 per week of six days. The freight charge in the United Kingdom was 2.23 cents per ton-mile.

GERMANY.

In Germany for the year 1913 the number of miles of railroad was 39,513, of which 36,538 were State owned. The average yearly pay was $409 per employee, or $1.30 per day, or $7.80 per week of six days. The freight charge was 1.37 cents per ton-mile.

The population of Germany in 1913 was 66,716,000. The area of Germany is 208,780 square miles. The population per square mile was 320 people, while that of the United States is but 30 people. The population of Germany was 1,698 for each mile of railroad, while that of the United States is but 381.

It will be borne in mind that the freight rates of Germany are double those of the United States, with a daily wage scale but one-half that of the United States, and with a population in Germany per mile of line nearly four times that of the United States it can readily be seen that if the population of the United States per mile of railroad line was equal to that of Germany the freight hauled by our railroads would be equivalent to four times that of the tonnage hauled at present. Therefore the percentage of cost per ton-mile would undoubtedly be less than at present.

RUSSIA.

Russia in 1910 had 41,612 miles of railroad. Her annual pay roll for employees was $211, or 67 cents per day, or $4.02 per week of six days. Her freight rate charge was 0.94 cent per ton-mile.

Russia's population per mile of railroad line in 1913 was 3,380, yet her freight charge per ton-mile was far in excess of ours.

SWITZERLAND.

Switzerland in 1915 had 3,224 miles of railroad. Her annual wage per man was $387, or $1.23 per day or $7.38 per week of six days. Her freight rate charge was 2.64 cents per ton-mile, and in spite of this enormous freight rate charge her Government owned and operated railroads had a deficit of $2,500,000.

JAPAN.

Japan in 1915, with 5,585 miles, largely narrow-gauge roads, Government owned but capitalized at $25,000 per mile more than the capitalization of the railroads of the United States—$88,104 per mile, as against a little less than $63,000 per mile in this country—has an annual wage scale of $115.16 per year, or 37 cents per day or $2.22 per week of six days. Her freight rate is 0.85 cent per ton-mile, or 20 per cent above that of the United States. She has a terminal charge of 11 cents additional.

Under private ownership all over the world there is jealousy and strife for more and better equipment. Governments are slow to adopt modern methods and equipment. One of the best proofs of this assertion is shown by the wonderful modern equipments of the Great Northern, Northern Pacific, and the St. Paul & Puget Sound Railways, spanning the prairies and tunneling the Rocky and Cascade Mountains, the last-named road in the last two years having equipped 445 miles of their main lines through Montana and Idaho with electricity, the most modern improvements, finest roadbeds, and most powerful electrical engines to be found in the world.

I have traveled over these roads many times within the last few years and twice during the year 1917.

The power with which the monster engines are operated is taken from the flow of water heretofore gone to waste in these great mountain States—a great saving of fuel to the world, so badly needed at this time and so strongly recommended by the Administration for conservation. Competition is the life of trade.

The improvement and extent of government-owned railroads throughout the world is moved by political influence largely, and does not always accommodate the greatest number of the people. Branch lines are usually built by political influence.

At this point I wish to say railroad construction in many parts of the country by government ownership, as stated before, has proven to be unwise, and I call attention to the Government-owned-railroad construction of Australia.

It has been stated by eminent authority that railroads in Australia undoubtedly have been built to backward districts where private ownership never would have touched. Some 46 miles of branch lines were built in Australia, and a report of the Victorian State Railways of 1907 states that they were constructed at a cost of $1,833,000, and that they were closed to traffic at various dates between 1898 and 1904, and later abandoned altogether, because gross receipts failed to cover operating expenses. This is government ownership though.

There is a vast difference between the management of railroads by the power of state where a monarchial form of government prevails and that of a country having a republican form of government. In a monarchy the heads of government remain in office quite indefinitely and direct the management of the state-owned railroads, while in a republic the chiefs may change as often as the head of the government—and that does not change often enough to suit some of us. [Laughter.]

For instance, the King of Prussia is really the head of the railroads, as he is head of the army and navy, and this power does not change during the life of the King. In such cases political influence may not be so great as in a country with a republican form of government.

Lack of discipline in the management of great corporations such as our railroads is more likely to be found where political influence controls than where private ownership prevails.

THE UNITED STATES.

The railroads of the United States comprise 250,233 miles of main lines for the year 1916—there were 387,000 miles of railroad in the United States, which includes double, treble, and quadruple tracks, as well as switches. On the 250,233 miles of main lines there were employed more than one and three-quarter millions of men. The annual pay roll for the year 1916—that of 1917 being not yet available—to employees averaged $887.37 per year, or $2.83 per day, or $16.98 per week of six days. The freight-rate charge was 0.714 of a cent per ton-mile. In other words, the wage scale is the highest of that paid to railroad employees of any country in the world and the freight rate the lowest.

At the same time it must not be forgotten that, in addition to the cost of operating expenses, our railroads paid heavy taxes; which is not true of Government-owned roads. The Government-owned railroads of all the countries of the world are exempt from taxes, while the taxes paid by the railroads of the United States, as shown by a report of the Bureau of Railway Economics, published in the city of Washington, D. C., Miscellaneous Series No. 25, page 17, paid in the year 1914, per mile operated, $572, or a total of $143,133,276, on 250,233 miles of line.

It must be borne in mind that in the statistical abstracts of the various countries of the world in which are shown the operating expenses of the Government-owned roads, this item of taxes in this country does not enter into the operating costs; therefore the Government-owned roads have that advantage in their reports of operating costs over the reports of privately owned roads. The comparisons are unfair and unjust to private ownership unless this item be taken into consideration.

Again, let me say that in Germany, where 95 per cent of all the railroads are government owned and operated, the wage scale is but one-half that of the United States and the freight rate double that paid by shippers of the United States.

The idea of Government ownership catches many of our people; has become a fad. But before being put into operation the most serious thought should be given to the question.

I make this speech upon Government ownership for the reason that the bill now before the Congress, and especially the one presented by the Administration, was sugar-coated from top to bottom with Government ownership.

It can be shown in every instance, by comparisons with other countries, that Government-owned and operated railroads have failed to show good results, and invariably the people have been called upon, by taxation, to meet deficits in the operation of the roads, while, on the other hand, freight rates have been greatly increased over the rates prevailing under private ownership.

Should the railroad property of the United States be taken over by the Government, it must be remembered that about one-eighth of all the taxable property of the country will be stricken from the tax roll, and the people owning the remainder of the taxable property will pay increased taxes to meet the ordinary running expenses of the municipal, county, State and National affairs, and will pay some $20,000,000,000 for railroads as well. At a time when this Government has gone, and is still going, into debt to an extent undreamed of heretofore, some serious thought should be given to this important move, namely, Government ownership of railroads.

The idea of Government ownership of railroads is socialistic in the extreme; and for 2,000 years the socialistic ideas throughout the world have very largely failed.

BELGIUM.

The Railway Library and Statistics of 1914, page 210, states:

In Belgium, with its 2,684 miles of State-owned and its 2,000 miles of privately owned lines, the operating ratio of the former was 65 per cent, while that of the latter was 45 per cent. Allowing for interest on the investment, the deficit of the State-owned lines, it is estimated by E. A. Pratt, would amount to $14,000,000 yearly.

On page 449 of the Railway Library these statistics are referred to as being for the last year reported, 1912, and gives the cost of construction per mile of the Government-owned railroads in Belgium as $192,000. It gives the freight rate per ton-mile as 1.13 cents. Railway employees received in wages $250.20 per year, or $4.81 per week. The ratio of expenses to earnings was 69.63 per cent, while in Holland the ratio of expenses, compared with earnings, was 85.33 per cent, both of which are excessively high.

In a recent writing by Col. Ed. F. Browne, entitled "Socialism or Empire a Danger," is found the following language, in chapter 1, page 7:

THE OBJECTS DESIRED BY THE FOUNDERS OF THE UNION.

Separation from England, the result of unequal and unjust taxation, business restriction and regulation, and undue investigation of the private business affairs of citizens.

Instructions of the delegates sent to the Continental Congress all indicate business unrest.

War declared July 6, 1775, over these business conditions.

The business freedom demanded by the Colonies not granted in a monarchy or empire.

Refusal of Parliament to consider requests ended in political freedom being declared July 4, 1776, one year after the war commenced.

An effort made to establish a government giving private incentive freedom from Government control.

Such, Mr. Browne states, was the intention of our forefathers who fought and suffered so much privation for the freedom of our country. If this be true, those who would have Government ownership are certainly drifting far afield from the intention of our forefathers.

That the ownership or operation of railroads by the Government would be bad because of the political influence I believe is borne out by the facts as they can be presented.

It will be remembered that in general elections the plurality given to a candidate for President for many years past has reached from about 7,000 to 500,000 votes, and when it is considered that Government ownership of railroads, telephones, telegraphs, and water and other transportation lines will bring political pressure to bear on practically the entire number of men on the Government pay roll it is time to stop and think.

Last year the employees, civil service, telephone, telegraph, railway (both steam and electric), water transportation, and express companies, numbered about 3,500,000. Of this number about 500,000 were under civil service, 225,000 were employed by the telephone and telegraph companies, 200,000 by the water-transportation companies, and 1,950,000 by the railroad companies.

It will be seen that the majority of these people were employed by the great corporations of the country that will come under Government control if the people decide upon Government ownership or Government control and operation of the railroads.

Does any man doubt, if these employees were under the control of the Government, that great pressure would be brought to bear upon the Government officials for increased wages and fewer hours for a day's work, and that weak politicians in times of campaign excitement (as was the case in the recent past) would yield to pressure and thus cement together the people making such demands, in the support of a political party, and then make the general public pay the bill, either by direct taxation or increased rates upon the railroads?

No such political power should be granted to any political party or any set of individuals in a political party.

This is a question of the greatest importance to the people of this country and one worthy of most careful thought.

The condition of the railroads of this country right now is critical. The Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed the maximum rate of freight the railroads may collect. A political party in Congress has fixed the minimum-wage scale for a certain class of railway employees, which has greatly increased the operating costs of the railroads. The Interstate Commerce Commission has declined (and stands like a stone wall) to grant the requests of the railroads for increased freight rates sufficient to meet the increased outlay of the companies. And the result is that more miles of railway are in the hands of receivers than ever before, and others are on the brink of bankruptcy. They have no money with which to add necessary improvements of rolling stock or terminals, and the result is, as is now well known, that the railroads at the present time are unable to handle the business offered. To me it appears that the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Congress of the United States for the past ten years have not dealt fairly with capital invested in the railroads of our country, and some relief must be given or railroad securities will go to the "dum dum bowwows."

At the close of the calendar year 1917, as shown by the Railway Age of January 4, 1918, there were in the hands of receivers 17,773 miles of main-line railroads, a fraction over 7 per cent of the total mileage of the United States, which is an exceptionally high percentage of the total, financially embarrassed. To this must be added the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad, which road went into receiver's hands January 26—2,580 miles, or a total of 20,353 miles. The estimated value of these roads is shown by the Railway Library to be about $60,000 per mile, or more than a total of $1,221,000,000.

This is conclusive evidence that at this time the laws of the country are not aiding the railroads but are detrimental to their success.

In fact in this very bill is contemplated an appropriation by the Government of the United States of $500,000,000, undoubtedly to be followed by greatly increased appropriations, for the purpose of adding to the railroads needed rolling stock, terminals, and all kinds of equipment and improvements to properly handle the business of the country. And at the same time there is pending before this House another bill authorizing the appropriation of $500,000,000 and the creation of a corporation, the purpose of which and the use of which money by that corporation is chiefly to loan money to the railroads of the country that are unable to borrow money from the banks and trust companies, because of the fact that railroad securities are not desirable in the money markets.

In railroad legislation in the past 10 years the pendulum has swung too far against the railroads, and must swing back or bankruptcy must follow and the general public pay the bill.

Control of business by Government is socialistic agitation or executive ambition. Careless legislation has already given greater executive control than has been intended.

The greatest danger to a Republic is hasty, hysterical action on the part of the people, and especially on the part of Congress. Franklin said:

Should we give executive power to the President that we would fear in others' hands?

Control of our great industries makes our executive department altogether too dominant a power, and threatens the very foundation of our good Government. This Government-control hysteria has gone so far to the extreme that there is a bill now pending before the House of Representatives for the taking over of the street railways of this city. Who would dream of such extravagant notions!

While it is claimed that the railroads of Germany come nearer being a success in the hands of the Government than do the railroads of any other country in the world Government controlled and operated, it must be conceded that in the cost of operation on these roads no taxes are paid to local, State, or General Government. The Government of Germany operates her railroads in a different manner, in some rspects, to that of any other Government of the world. For instance, the German railroads are used as a tariff wall. A cheaper freight rate is given on goods manufactured for export, shipped from an interior town in Germany to a seaport, than is given on the same goods between the two points of shipments which are to be consumed in Germany, thus encouraging exports in both manufactured and agricultural products. While, on the other hand, practically a double freight rate is charged from a seaport town in Germany to a point interior on imported goods as against domestic goods shipped between the same two points. This, together with Germany's tariff laws, operates as a very high protective tariff.

AUSTRIA.

Austria in 1913 had 14,185 miles of railroad. Her annual wage scale was $322, or $1.03 per day, or $6.18 per week of six days. Her annual deficit on Government-owned roads was about $25,000,000.

In a historical sketch of Government ownership of railroads in foreign countries, by W. M. Ackworth, published at Washington, D. C., in May, 1917, on page 17, this statement will be found:

They are all alike in the fact that political, and especially military, reasons compelled the State to make railways which private enterprise was not prepared to undertake. They are alike, too, in the fact that the tendency has swayed back and forth as between State and private ownership. Austria at one time sold to private companies a number of railways that had been built by the State. Nowadays, having bought most of them back again, it owns 80 per cent of the total. One incident of the transfer deserves to be related. The Kaiser Ferdinand Nordbahn was an old and very rich company. Its dividends for the previous five years had averaged over 12 per cent. It was taken over in 1906. In 1910 the president of the Austrian Chamber of Deputies described the result as follows: "We have always been in favor of the State taking over the railways, but if we had been able to foresee the results of the management I assure you we would have hesitated a little longer. We are still in favor of the principle, but it does seem to us that our Government has performed a remarkable feat when it has succeeded in creating a deficit on the Northern Railway. The Government have enlisted an army of new employees; they have gone much too far in the matter of reduction of hours of labor; instead of commercial management they have appointed lawyers to posts that require business men or experts; they have established an entirely unpracticable bureaucracy. At the present moment we are face to face with a deficit of $25,000,000. There would be no deficit at all if the return from our railways were that which it ought to be. I regret that absolute imbecility has characterized the taking over of our service."

This statement was made by high authority in Austria and ought to have some weight in the argument against Government ownership of railroads. But this is Government ownership.

STATE OWNERSHIP FAILED IN SOUTH AMERICA.

After a record of deficits, politics, inefficiency, bad service, and bad management, most of the lines in Brazil, Chile, Peru, and Argentina have been leased to private companies. All the larger Republics of South America at some time have tried Government ownership of railways. Most of them have abandoned the policy as an absolute failure.

The private-owned roads of South America for every $100 of gross receipts have spent from $31 to as high as $68, while the Government-owned roads for every $100 of gross receipts have spent from $121 to $164. This contrast between the cost of operation of private-owned and Government-owned roads in these southern Republics is exceedingly striking, and should be taken as an evidence of the inability of a government, because of the political influence, to successfully operate railroads.

Nearly every country in the world within the last decade has materially increased the freight rates on its railroads, and especially on government-owned roads, while the Government of the United States, through the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission over rate fixing in this country, has permitted the railroads to make little or no advance in their freight and passenger rates, though the cost of operating expenses, chiefly due to increased wages to their employees, has greatly increased. The result is that the railroads of the United States, because of adverse railroad legislation by our Federal Government, are run down and do not have sufficient equipment, freight cars, and locomotives to handle the business of the country.

I could give in detail the cost of operation and the total receipts of practically every country in the world, and it would show greater cost in operation on government-owned roads than on private-owned roads. This might add to the information already given, but the time granted me for this speech will not permit. I wish, however, to say that I have been unable to find, after long and diligent search, a single instance of railroad, government owned, controlled, and operated, that equaled, in efficiency and economy and the service rendered, that of private-owned railroads.

The Civil War was one of the most terrible of all wars in the history of the world.

When it occurred there were 36,000 miles of railroad in this country. Our Government, during its four years' duration, took control of 2,100 miles, about 6 per cent of the total mileage.

We declared war on Germany in April, 1917, and no railroad in the United States as yet has declined to comply with any or all requests or orders of the Government. Yet in less than nine months' time our Government has taken over all the railroads.

Several questions are involved:

First. What is its significance?

Second. What will be the effect financially?

Third. What will be the effect on efficiency of transportation?

Fourth. What will it cost the taxpayers?

Fifth. What will it cost the people to let go?

That the railroads have not been overly prosperous for the past three years is shown by their net receipts during that time, which were as follows.

Net earnings on investments:

	Per cent.

Not a high rate of income on invested capital. Not sufficiently high to attract money.

Where is all this money coming from that is being called for by the Government for all these enterprises? There was $50,000,000 asked for the other day for building houses in shipyards; another, of $100,000,000, asked for some other purpose. When thinking this over, there occurred to me one of the finest illustrations in the world as to where this money is coming from. It reminds me of an old darkey that was sick and about to die, who sent for his minister to write his will. He said to the minister, "Put down $250 for my beloved daughter." And the minister wrote it down. "Now, put down $350 for the church." The minister said to the family, "Ain't it wonderful how this man retains his consciousness to de last?" He then turned to the minister and said, "Now, put down $1,000 for my good wife. I came mighty near forgetting dat woman." The minister said, "Look here, Brudder Jones, where is all this money coming from?" "Dat is none of your business where it's coming from. Put down what I tells you and den let 'em find it." [Laughter.]

The Government is going to find its money somewhere, and the people will pay the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I would thank the gentleman if he would yield me 10 minutes more. I do not like to keep you so late, but I have a little more to say that is important, and I will conclude in half that time if I can.

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank the gentleman, and I will try to conclude in less time than 10 minutes.

And in closing I want to say, gentlemen, that our Secretary of the Treasury, a gentleman for whom I have the highest esteem, has now had imposed upon him not only the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury, but he is chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. It seems to me that there is sufficient responsibility there to employ one man's entire time. Again, he is made Director General of the railroads of the country; and, again, he is to be made chairman of this great corporation which is to loan not only to the railroads but to all the industries of this country money that under existing law the Federal reserve banks now can not loan, not having authority of law. I presume I will vote for all those bills, but I fear the responsibility placed upon the Secretary of the Treasury by being at the head of those four great institutions to handle the governmental affairs of this country will result in one of two things—either an overworked Secretary of the Treasury or omission of duty.

And I will say, gentlemen, there must be some end to all this expenditure of money by this great Government. And we should hesitate when we are revolving in our minds the question of taking over the railroads of this country to be Government owned and Government operated. No such responsibility has ever been placed upon any people on the face of the earth; and in every instance—and I defy successful contradiction—where State or Government owned or controlled railroads have been tried it has proven a failure and will prove a failure here, if tried, by the Government of the United States.

I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9685) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RELIEF OF MAIL CONTRACTOR.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3689.

The SPEAKER pro tempore The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3689. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman withhold that?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes on the subject of the fuel-conservation order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that on next Monday, immediately after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ESCH. This may not be concluded by Saturday night.

Mr. RAINEY. In that event, at the conclusion of the bill.

Mr. ESCH. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CHOCTAW INDIANS OF MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 9961, which was referred through an error to the Committee on Appropriations be rereferred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 9961 be rereferred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The clerk at the Speaker's table says that reference was made by mistake. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I will have to move to adjourn.

RELIEF OF MAIL CONTRACTOR.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill S. 3689.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How much time is it going to take?

Mr. BORLAND. It ought not to take any time at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What is it?

Mr. BORLAND. It is a Senate bill, by which the Postmaster General wants to adjust a mail contract. It has passed the Senate and has been before the House commitee and was favoraby reported back, and the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has tried to get it up several times.

Mr. FORDNEY. I trust the gentleman will not offer that, as I will be obliged to object.

Mr. BORLAND. Very well. I will withdraw it.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 20, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

WEDNESDAY, February 20, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we lift our hearts to Thee for Divine inspiration. Fit us for the duties of this day. We would wait before Thee as those who look for the larger life and know that in the unfolding of Thy plans there is a Divine purpose in all the movements of this mighty Nation. Fit us for the issues and for the final result and for the glory of the purpose that Thou hast in us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Acting Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation of $2,500,000 required by the Quartermaster Corps for mileage to officers and contract surgeons, etc. (S. He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the amount of $400 for an additional clerk of class 1 (S. Doc. No. 175), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have a resolution adopted by the City Council of Tacoma, Wash., relating to water-power matters. I shall not have the resolution read and printed in the RECORD, but it asks that in any water-power legislation that Congress may pass authority shall be given to the several States and legal subdivisions thereof to condemn the rights of any licensees, and also calls attention to the fact that under our law municipalities are permitted to and do regulate the rights of public-service corporations, and asks that they be not interfered with.

I also find that the City Council of Seattle have passed a similar resolution.

I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a memorial of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Seattle, Wash., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the running of railroad tracks directly opposite the Lucy Webb Hayes National Training School and the Sibley Memorial Hospital in the city of Washington, D. C., which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GRONNA presented a memorial of the North Dakota State Dairymen's Association, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation favoring oleomargarine and discriminating against butter and other dairy products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Art Club of Minot, N. Dak., praying for the repeal of the advanced second-class postage rates, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the North Dakota Implement Dealers' Association, of Hope, N. Dak., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Yellville, Ark., praying for the repeal of the existing rates of postage on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a memorial of the Central Labor Union of Portsmouth, N. H., remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called Borland minimum eight-hour provision, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Medical Society of Dover, N. H., praying that advanced rank be given officers in the Medical Corps of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Ebell Society, of Santa Ana Valley, Cal., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire to have the Secretary read at the desk a telegram from the governor of the State of Colorado.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DENVER, COLO., February 16, 1918.

Hon. JOHN F. SHAFROTH,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Woman suffrage has been very beneficial to the State of Colorado and its citizenship. I think it a just and wise movement to extend the right of suffrage to the women of the Nation.

JULIUS C. GUNTER,
Governor of Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say in confirmation of the declarations contained in that telegram that I have examined as to the views of every governor of the State of Colorado and find that every one of them has given testimony to the beneficial effect of woman suffrage in that State.

I wish to call attention to a few sentences that were uttered by one of the governors who with prophetic vision 48 years ago voiced what would be the result of this movement. I read from the Rocky Mountain Herald of January 19, 1870. It says:

Gov. Edward Moody McCook, of the "fighting McCooks," as they were known in the Civil War, recommended woman suffrage in his message to the Territorial legislature of Colorado, delivered before the joint session of the council (Territorial senate) and house January 4, 1870, in which he said:

"Before dismissing the subject of franchise I desire to call your attention to one question connected with it, which you may deem of sufficient importance to demand some consideration at your hands before the close of the session. Our higher civilization has recognized woman's equality with man in all other respects save one, suffrage. It has been said that no great reform was ever made without passing through three stages—ridicule, argument, and adoption. It rests with you to say whether Colorado will accept this reform in its first stage, as our sister Territory of Wyoming has done, or in the last; whether she shall be a leader in the movement or a follower, for the logic of a progressive civilization leads to the inevitable result of universal suffrage."

Mr. President, it seems to me that in the Nation at large these first two stages have taken place—first, of ridicule, and, second, of argument; the third, of adoption, is about to be consummated. Since England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland have now equal suffrage of women, it appears to me that we can do nothing better for civilization and good government than to adopt it by an overwhelming majority in the Senate.

DISTRICT JUDGE FOR NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. OVERMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 3217) providing for the appointment of an additional district judge for the western judicial district of the State of North Carolina reported it without amendment.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, Senate bill 3752.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

Mr. STERLING. I send to the desk a proposed amendment to the pending bill and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained the floor.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask the Senator from South Carolina if he will not permit this bill to be set aside that we may act on the conference report upon Senate bill 3389.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask the Senator from Alabama to yield. This is a very important conference report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How long will it take?

Mr. RANSDELL. It ought to take but a very few minutes. I submitted the conference report yesterday, and it went over until to-day in order that it might be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, there is no question about the importance of the bill which the Senator from Louisiana has in charge. We should enact it as soon as possible, but I confess that I am not satisfied with one of the provisions of the conference agreement. I refer to advances of money to contractors and others who may become engaged in the erection of the structures contemplated by the bill. That part of the conference report empowers the Shipping Board to advance money upon such terms and security as it may deem proper to those who are to be engaged in this work for a term not exceeding 10 years.

I think that is a most dangerous provision and one which should be eliminated from bills under consideration and from conference reports as well, unless rigidly safeguarded. Advances which have been made under similar provisions of other laws, and particularly by the Shipping Board, as disclosed in the recent hearings of the Commerce Committee not yet completed, and advances made by the War Department to men who, having obtained contracts, secure these advances to build plants, having none when the contract was granted, have led and will lead to an unwise, extravagant—I fear scandalous—expenditure of public money. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] mentioned an instance yesterday in committee, occurring in his State, where some one having obtained a contract for manufacturing war materials received an advance of millions, as he had no plant whatever, and it will take, of course, a very considerable time to erect the structure where the materials are to be constructed and furnished. Such conditions occurring with the best of intentions are frought with danger.

In view of these experiences, we ought to rigidly safeguard the interests of the Government with reference to these advances, and that does not seem to have been done heretofore. In fact the Government may be likened to a huge vessel freighted with a rich cargo surrounded by pirates seeking collusion at times with the crew which mans it for the purpose of loot. Contracts demanding large advances should not be let at all when avoidable, and advances should be secured as amply as they would be in private transactions.

Of course, I make no reflection—I hope I do not—upon the conference committee, who have done their work earnestly and actuated by the best considerations; but before I vote for this conference report I want this matter explained more fully than can be done under present circumstances. Therefore if the report comes up at present I shall be obliged to resist it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I would be very glad to explain the matter and would like to get the report before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I would be glad to yield to my friend from Louisiana for this purpose under other circumstances, but I am not disposed to do so at this time, for this reason: One of the most important bills that confronts the Congress is now pending. A time limit has been set on general debate, and general debate extends only until 2 o'clock to-morrow. Not only myself but other Senators desire to discuss the question that is now before the Senate. If there was no limit on debate on the railroad bill I would be glad to yield, but the Senate having fixed a limit on debate, I do not think it fair to those who desire to have a full discussion on the pending bill that other controverted legislation should be interjected at this time. Therefore I can not yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, we have declared to the world that we fight our armies on the battle fields of France to make the world safe for democracy. That is a great shibboleth for our soldiers to carry to the fighting line. It is in accord with the historic and fundamental principles of our Government. This, the first great Republic of the world, was established to make democracy safe. It lives to make democracy safe. It must fight to make democracy safe, and no one will raise a contention on that score.

But, Mr. President, we may fight to make the world safe for democracy on the fields of Europe, and whilst we are doing so should we neglect democracy in the States of America? Should we fail to see that the great principles of our Government are not carried out that make the principles of democracy safe for our own people?

Since the begininng of this war the Congress can congratulate itself upon the fact that it has upheld the hands of the Executive of this Government loyally and sincerely in every effort that he has made to carry on the war. We can congratulate ourselves that there has been no partisan spirit shown in the Halls of Congress; that the Republican Party, as well as the Democratic Party, has responded to the call of the Nation and has upheld the flag in the hands of the President of the United States. I do not think that there has ever been a time in the history of nations when a great people have been more united in their support of a cause than our people have been in the last nine months.

Mr. President, there has been some criticism of the executive branch of the Government in carrying out the war powers which have been delegated to it by the Congress.

Of necessity some mistakes have been made. You can not carry on a great business enterprise without making mistakes; you can not carry on a great Government without making mistakes. Every fair-minded man must recognize that when this Government was injected into the greatest war of the ages, without preparation and without preparedness, of necessity serious mistakes must be made in the mobilization of our armies and in the initial preparation for war; but, in my judgment, those mistakes have been of minor moment when you consider the mobilization of the greatest army that America has ever raised, when you consider that we have taken the great industries of this country out of the usual channels of trade and converted them into a war machine and made them effective. I think it is idle to criticise the mistakes which have been made, except for the purpose of pointing the way to a better method of accomplishing the result. I do not criticise the man who points out a mistake. If it is a real mistake and an honest criticism such action is for the benefit of the Government and for the good of the country.

But, Mr. President, with all that Congress has to its credit in the loyal way it has upheld the hands of the President and supported the cause of war, I think the time has come when we should pause and consider whether we, holding the great legislative functions of this Government, have not ourselves made some mistakes—not mistakes of the heart, but mistakes due to the generosity and the patriotism of Congress in its endeavor to respond at once to the needs of the Nation.

"Make the world safe for democracy." Shall we abandon the safety of democracy for our own people? What makes democracy safe for the people of the United States? What makes democracy safe for any government in the world? The fathers who established this Republic solved the problem for us more than a century ago. They realized that a democracy which legislated in the forum, a democracy which responded to the sentiment of the hour, was not a democracy which was safe for the government of a people. On the other hand, we know that democracy can not be safe in the hands of an autocratic government; that a democracy can not be safe when the power of government is placed in the hands of men, and not regulated by just laws. The fathers who led the Revolution against the autocratic Government of Great Britain realized on the one hand that the government of a dictator, the will of one man, could not be a safe government for the people. On the other hand, the French Revolution was an example that a democracy that drew its breath and its power from the mob in the street could not protect the liberty of the people.

The Congress can not nullify the plain provisions of the Constitution, but through neglect in safeguarding them in our legislation we can in a large measure make them inoperative. The Constitution contemplates that all officers of importance shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, as a guard against incompetent and unworthy men exercising the power of government. When the Congress in its legislation allows men to be appointed to office by subordinate officials to exercise great power over the people of the country one of the safeguards of the Constitution has been in part abandoned. The Congress can confide great governmental powers to the Executive, without defining their scope or limiting their operation, leaving the subordinates of the Chief Magistrate to adopt rules and regulations for the government of the people that have the force and effect of law and are often oppressive and dangerous in their character. When the Congress has done its full duty to the people, it should fully define the scope of the law and the terms of its enforcement in the statute as it is enacted, so all men may read as they run and the greatest citizen in the land may not trench on the rights of the humblest and all men shall stand equal before the law.

More than a hundred years have rolled by since the French Revolution, and to-day in Europe we have the same example again set us. We see the power of an autocracy—the last great autocracy that this world shall know—the power of the German Emperor, driving the world into the horrors and terrors of a world war for greed of power, for aggrandizement of territory under the despotism of a single nation. Yet, on the other hand, we have seen the fall of a great autocracy in Russia; we have seen those people attempting to establish a government for the people; we have seen it fall into the hands of an uncontrolled mob; we have seen the power of that government exercised without law, without checks, and without balances; we have seen a legislative assembly chosen by the people dispersed at the point of the bayonet because that government had swung from the power of the autocrat to the despotism of the mob.

Our own Government possesses to-day the checks and balances in the Constitution of the United States that protect us from the despotism of the autocrat and the ruthless spirit of the mob, provided the Congress of the United States will uphold and maintain the sovereign powers created by the people of the United States and enshrined in the Constitution of our country; but when the Congress of the United States reaches a point where it is prepared to abandon constitutional limitations, surrender a government of law and establish a government of men, then there is danger ahead for the people of the United States.

After the adoption of the Constitution the wise men of that day felt that there were further checks and balances that should be written into that instrument for the protection of the people of the United States, and they adopted the first 10 amendments to the Constitution for that purpose. Article VI of the Constitution provides:

> This Constitution, and the laws of the United States that shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land—

A distinct declaration in favor of a government of law and not a government of men. Our people even in time of war are entitled to a government of law, and not a government of men.

I am not critical of what has been done in the past. If I were I would be critical of myself, because I have responded, as my colleagues on this floor have responded, to the request of the President and to the call of the Nation to give the Executive of this Government the power to conduct the war; but the war has been on for nine months. Speed was required in the beginning. The Congress did not then have the opportunity, with our fleets on the sea and the lives of our citizens in danger, carefully and deliberately to write the laws which should govern the country and regulate the procedure under the great powers given to the Executive. But that speed is no longer needed. Unlimited supply of money has already been given; a million and a half men have been enlisted in our Army; our Navy is effective and efficient; we can not possibly get to France within the next few months the soldiers that we have in the cantonments in America to-day. Speed in legislation is no longer required. The time has come when we have the opportunity to consider, and we should consider wisely, to deliberate, and we should deliberate well, before we put on the American people ill-considered legislation, legislation that is not drafted so that it will protect their fundamental rights even in time of war.

Mr. President, I intend to vote for this bill, unless it is amended by the Senate in some of its fundamental provisions that would prevent my doing so, and I am not apprehensive that the Senate before its final vote will agree to any such amendment. I feel that in the enactment of this legislation we should not content ourselves with merely giving general powers to the Executive and then allow the Executive to make the rules and regulations that will govern the people of the United States. If that had been the purpose of the people when they organized the Government, they would not have provided for a legislative assembly. We know that in order to have a strong Government we must delegate the executive power to a single head; that for the execution of the law one hand is more forceful and more effective than a dozen hands; but we know that the experience of ages has taught us that if we are to make laws under which our people must live, laws that shall be the foundation for the real government of our country, we must have reflected in a legislative assembly the wisdom of the people as voiced by their selected representatives. Safe government for democracy can not be accomplished in any other way. Abandon a government of law, and you come to the autocracy of Germany on the one hand or the mob of Russia on the other.

We may adopt the pending bill, with its lack of limitations and its crudeness of draft, as a war measure; but when we step one foot beyond the period of this war, when we have carried the whole transportation system of the United States out of its usual channels, out of the checks and balances of established government, and turned it over to a one-man power, and it projects itself beyond the period of this war, we are establishing the machinery of oppression; we are building up an organization for the destruction of business; we are endangering the fundamental rights of the American people; and I therefore say that unless the bill is limited to the period of the war and a reasonable time thereafter, it can not receive my support.

I know that behind the bill stalks the shadow of two contending forces—on the one hand, men who honestly believe that the great transportation problems of this country can never be properly solved in the interest of the people unless you have direct Government ownership; and, on the other hand, men who honestly believe that there is great danger in Government ownership, and believe that the problems of transportation can be better solved by Government control and private ownership. I say to the contending factions on both sides of that question that this is not the hour or the time for those problems to be solved; that this is not the forum where we can deliberately and efficiently dispose of those questions for the benefit of the people of the United States.

Every Senator here knows how difficult it is to legislate under existing conditions. Every patriot—and I do not question the patriotism of a man who occupies a seat in this Chamber—every patriot, in times like these, desires his record to stand without a blemish before his country. He is naturally and justifiably desirous of avoiding criticism that may reflect on his loyal support of the Government, he desires to be loyal to the flag, and to do his full duty to the soldier boys who fight to-day on the fields of France. In the hours of excitement, the hours of national danger, it is but natural that men's motives may be reflected on by those who differ with them, that men's attitudes may be misunderstood when they occupy a position which combats the executive head or the views of the majority that happens to report legislation to this body. It is difficult for men to rise above those conditions, to have that freedom of thought, that freedom of action, which they can and will have when this war has been successfully fought out for the cause of democracy. Therefore I say this is no hour for our Government to involve itself in fundamental legislation; it is not the hour when we should jockey for position; it is not the hour when we should use pending legislation for the purpose of establishing a position that we may wish to occupy when the war is over.

Therefore, when I say that I feel that there should be a limitation on the legislation defined in the bill, it is not because I side with those who favor Government ownership of railroads, or because I have become a partisan of those who favor Government control of railroads; but it is merely because I believe that the crudeness of the legislation, its lack of checks and balances to protect the people of the United States, should carry with its adoption a guaranty that the legislation shall be returned to the Congress of the United States without limitation and without checks and without embarrassments as soon as it is practicable to do so after this war is over.

The bill provides a limitation of 18 months, and I am willing to accept the bill under those circumstances. I am frank to say that in the committee I favored a shorter time; but the committee reached an agreement, a compromise on the question, and agreed to report a bill limiting the operation of this law to 18 months after the close of the war. I accepted the compromise, and am prepared to stand by it.

Mr. President, I do not think we can thoroughly and understandingly discuss the pending legislation unless we consider the surrounding facts and circumstances that brought the bill before the Congress of the United States.

In August, 1916, a foreign military force had crossed the border of the United States and invaded one of our cities, and had murdered some of our citizens. The Government of the United States was mobilizing an Army on the Mexican border. It was necessary for the protection of our people. At the same time the great railroad organizations of this country were contending with the owners of the railroads for increased wages. It appeared that a dangerous, universal railroad strike might occur in the United States at any time.

A railroad strike at that time would have prevented the mobilization of our troops on the border, because without transportation we could not have moved the National Guard from the several States to the Rio Grande. At that time a bill was pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee providing for the Government's taking charge of the railroads should that contingency arise; but the committee had not reported the bill. It was still under consideration when an amendment was offered to a supply bill, an appropriation bill of some kind, to take care of the situation; and that amendment was adopted and enacted into law. It read in this way:

> The President in time of war is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation, or any part thereof, and to utilize the same to t' exclusion, as far as may be necessary, of all other traffic for the transfer or transportation of troops, war material, and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful and desirable.

That piece of legislation shows conclusively the unwisdom of the Congress legislating about grave matters without due consideration. No man in either Chamber of the Congress at the time the legislation was passed thought for one moment that it was giving power to the Government of the United States to take over the entire railroad systems of this country. It was passed for a purpose, and a single purpose, and that purpose was to enable the Government to mobilize its troops on the Mexican border.

Conditions changed. Instead of a war with Mexico, within one year we found ourselves involved in the greatest war of history. Instead of requiring railroad transportation for the movement of troops, we found that the railroad systems of this country had broken down in the movement of war material to the ports on our eastern seaboard. It became necessary to take some action in reference to the situation; and under the Mexican border mobilization act, with the consent of the railroads, the President of the United States, by proclamation, took over the great railroad systems of the country. I say "with the consent of the railroads" because I sat in the Committee on Interstate Commerce for two weeks, heard the representatives of the railroads testify in reference to the bill, and up to this good hour I have not heard one of them raise a point of objection to the railroads being taken over by the Government of the United States.

More than that, I think it is clear that if the railroads of the United States had resisted the power of the Government, the courts would have maintained their existing status until the Congress legislated. Now, I am not contending that it was not necessary to take action. I agree that some action in this matter must have been taken. I am not criticising the President for authorizing the taking over of the railroads by the Government, but I think in passing the legislation we might as well look the question squarely in the face and recognize that the railroads of this country were taken over by their consent and with their acquiescence. It is apparent that they could not have been taken over if they had not agreed to it. The fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides, in part, as follows:

> Nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The President of the United States did not propose to take over the roads without just compensation. In his proclamation he stated that they should have just compensation. He stated the terms on which he believed just compensation should be given, so that there was no intention on the part of the Executive to violate the Constitution. But the law itself was short. The law had not provided for just compensation. In the statute of August 29, 1916, no provision whatever is made for the payment of just compensation upon the taking over of the railroads.

I will not occupy the time of the Senate in citing law cases, but the courts of the land have held from the beginning that a statute which takes private property, but does not within the terms of that statute provide just compensation for property taken, is in violation of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States and must fall.

During the course of the testimony before the committee which had the bill in charge I asked one of the leading lawyers who represented the railroads before the committee as to whether he considered the provisions of the act of August 29, 1916, as constitutional, and he said he did not. I think it is demonstrated beyond cavil that if there had been a resistance on the part of the railroads in taking them under Government control they could not have been taken over until there was legislation by the Congress of the United States. I say this not for the purpose of this debate but——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Would not the constitutional requirement have been satisfied, notwithstanding the silence of the statute on the subject, by the right of the railroad companies to go into the courts and recover just compensation? The courts were open to them and the decision of what is just compensation is at any rate a judicial question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I recognize what the Senator says——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to add this further remark in this connection, to which I think the Senator will agree, as no doubt he is familiar with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is not a violation of the Constitution to take property without compensation. All that is necessary is that there shall be a reasonable means of obtaining compensation, in other words, due process of law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely. The Senator has stated the case exactly—that there shall be a reasonable means of obtaining just compensation.

Now, I had that matter in mind when the bill was before the committee. There is a general law on the statute books of this country which authorizes a citizen of the country, under certain circumstances when his property is taken, to go into the courts and sue for just compensation. But I called that statute itself to the attention of the distinguished lawyer who was representing the railroad companies before the committee, and asked him whether that statute would validate the act of August 29, 1916, and he said he did not think it would, that it did not provide the means of just compensation under these circumstances; that the taking over of the railroads temporarily, not permanently, the establishment of a partial system of compensation could not be taken care of by the general statute. More than that, the railroad obligations had to be met, the payment of the men, the payment for their supplies. If a railroad company was forced simply to quit its business, leave its debts unpaid, and go to the Court of Claims to file a suit to recover judgment some year or two years or a decade thereafter, such a statute could not and would not in reasonableness meet this situation, and no court would hold that it would.

Therefore, I agreed with the distinguished lawyer who represented the railroads in his statement that the laws of the land were not such that under the act of August 29, 1916, there was any provision for just compensation to pay for the property taken over by the President.

That being the case, the Congress is confronted with this condition. We have taken possession of the great transportation lines of America. It is not a question as to whether we are going to take them or what we are going to do; they are already in the possession of the Government. On the other hand, we are confronted by the fact that there is no law on the statute books to pay the owners of this property their just compensation for the taking. So legislation by Congress must inevitably follow the meeting of these conditions. We can not avoid it.

But there is another fundamental question involved here, and that is how far our powers extend. The courts have repeatedly held, in decision after decision which I will not take up the time of the Senate to read, for I am sure no Senator here will controvert the fact, that the legislative body has no power to fix in its enactment what is just compensation for property taken. It is a matter of judicial ascertainment and not of legislative enactment. Therefore, we meet that limitation along our path in the enactment of this legislation, that we have not the power to prescribe what shall be the terms of payment for the taking over of these railroad properties. There was no man on the committee who raised a contention about that. I do not think there is any man in the Government or any man in the railroad organizations who controverts that suggestion.

Your committee in considering this legislation found itself confronted with the fact, on the one hand, that we had possession of the railroads; on the other that we must provide for just compensation for the taking of the railroads, but did not have the power to fix what that just compensation should be. So your committee has reported a bill here recognizing the taking over of the railroads as a lawful act by the President of the United States, and also providing that, if an agreement can not be reached otherwise, any of the owners of this property may go to the Court of Claims and sue in that court for the value of the property. So the bill meets the requirements of the Constitution in that particular.

But it must be apparent to all that if we had stopped there we would not have accomplished the full requirements that are needed for this legislation. It must be apparent to every man that if we had relegated the owners of the railroads to the Court of Claims and brought about endless litigation we would not have relieved the country in this situation; that the salaries of the men must be paid, and there must be provisions for paying them. The railroads must run, and they must continue to be going concerns. Their liabilities must be met and must be met promptly. Therefore, following a suggestion made by the President of the United States, between the two horns of the dilemma—the taking of the railroads, on one hand, and their right to go to the court for just compensation on the other—the committee in reporting this bill to Congress has attempted to write into it a vehicle by which an arrangement can be made between the Government and the owners of this property that will settle the case out of court.

Mr. President, if this were permanent legislation, if this settlement were to fix on the people of the United States a permanent charge for all time to come based on the value of this property, reached in a settlement of this kind, I would not support the bill. I think when the time comes, if it ever comes, for the permanent taking over of the railroads by the Government or for the permanent control of the railroads in the hands of private owners by the Government, in either case one problem must be solved before you can move a step toward the final disposition of the question, and that is to determine what is the value of these great railroad systems.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that there is one problem more important than that which must be determined first, namely, the constitutional power of the Federal Government to take over a railroad system or a multitude of railroad systems and embark upon the business of running railroads in the country as a private proprietor would do?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is probably correct. At least it is a grave problem that needs careful and full consideration when the time comes. But I was not discussing the question from that standpoint. I am not discussing the question from the standpoint of permanent legislation, except to say that if this is intended to be permanent legislation I am not willing to leave the question to a committee appointed by the President of the United States to determine what is the value of these railroads. I think if it is going to be a permanent ascertainment of their value, and under that ascertainment create a fixed charge for all time to come on the traffic of this country, then the people of the United States are entitled to have the ascertainment of that question determined in the courts of the land. There is no other place where it can properly be determined. We have a Government of law. We are a law-abiding people. We accept as the final arbiter of justice and right in this country but one great power—the courts of the land. We have divorced the courts of the land from political contentions. We have divorced the courts of the land from private greed. We have set the courts of the land here to ascertain the law and the justice for the people of the United States, and so grave and great a question as this can not be finally and properly determined in any other forum than that forum, which gives the contending parties on either side the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

But as a temporary measure for the period of the war and for a short time thereafter I, as a representative of the people of Alabama and you, as representatives of the people of other States, in my judgment, can afford to commit this question to the President of the United States for its temporary ascertainment; and I believe for a temporary ascertainment it is better to commit the question to the President and his agents rather than to drive the railroads into the courts at this time for its final ascertainment.

There can not be any very serious injury that will happen to the people of the United States even if the railroads are given too great a compensation at this time for a year or two. It may be one of the burdens of the war that we must carry, one of those burdens that the people of the United States have indicated many times in the last few months they are willing to carry cheerfully, loyally, and patriotically; but it would be a very different question if by our enactment we proposed to tie this burden finally around the necks of the people of the United States for an indefinite time to come.

Complaint has been made here that the bill proposes to give the railroads too great a compensation as a rental value for the railroads. I think we should look at the question fairly and justly. In an emergency I might properly give you a very much higher rental for your automobile than under ordinary conditions I would be justified in paying you, and in an emergency and a disruption of your own business you might be justified in asking me a much higher rental for your automobile than under ordinary circumstances you would be justified in asking.

This taking, as the bill stands, is not a permanent taking. The compromise that we authorize the President to make is a temporary compromise. It is to pay the railroads not only for the use of the railroads to-day but the taking of the railroads out of the hands of their present owners and diverting their freight, diverting their business, from the usual channels of trade is a question that should be considered when we recognize that some day in the near future, if the bill stands as it is written, these railroads will go back into the hands of their owners with possibly their entire business system torn up by the roots.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me for a brief suggestion, I think his argument, perhaps, would be invulnerable if the amount paid was slightly excessive and it extended to all roads; but, as I understand this bill, from the tables which have been submitted by those who have discussed it in support of and against it, a number of the roads will receive very large returns, whereas others, notwithstanding the destruction of their business, to which the Senator has referred, by reason of the Government taking them over, will receive small returns because their returns in the past have been small. The plan of this bill does not propose to equalize the amounts which shall be paid to the various railroad companies; some will have very large earnings—too large, in my opinion; larger than are warranted—while others may have returns too small. That fact will provoke unrest, criticism, and resentment among the railroads, and certainly will provoke criticism and resentment upon the part of those who are compelled to pay to those railroads to whom payments will be paid by the Government returns not warranted and greatly in excess of a fair earning upon the capitalization of the roads.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the bill justified the premise the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has laid down, I think his argument would be correct; but, so far as I understand the bill, it does not justify the contention that the Senator makes. As I stated in the beginning, this bill provides for the taking over of the railroads on the one hand and their right to enter the Court of Claims and to sue for just compensation on the other; but in between those two points an effort has been made to allow the President to compromise and reach an agreement with the railroads as to what is fair and just compensation for a rental value for their temporary use and taking over.

Of course I have listened to the arguments which have been made here by able Senators. I gather from the arguments which have been made that they do not view this bill from the standpoint that I do or they do not consider the limitations of the bill the same as I do or they would not make those arguments; but when you come down to the question of the President making this agreement with the railroads—I will not weary the Senate by going into all the details—there are two distinct provisions: One relates to railroads that have been solvent and have been paying dividends, to what are called in this bill the "dividend-paying railroads"; the other relates to the railroads which in the last three years have paid no dividends and are more or less weak or insolvent or have been in bankruptcy.

As to the last provision, those Senators who have rested their argument on the contention that has just been stated by the Senator from Utah, have made no objection, so far as I have heard, to the provisions of the bill in reference to nondividend-paying railroads; they have not contended that the President is going to pay too much or too little or to discriminate against one railroad in favor of another; and yet that section in reference to the nondividend-paying railroads reads in this way:

If the President shall find that the condition of any nondividend-paying carrier was during all or a substantial portion of the period of three years ended June 30, 1917, because of nonoperation, receivership, or where recent expenditures for additions or improvements or equipment when not fully reflected in the net operating railway income of the said three years or a substantial portion thereof, or other undeveloped or abnormal conditions, so exceptional as to make the basis of earnings, hereinabove provided for, plainly inequitable as a fair measure of just compensation, then the President may make with the carrier such agreement for such amount as just compensation as under the circumstances of the particular case he shall find just.

As to that class of railroads there is no limitation at all. The bill gives the President the absolute unlimited right to make an agreement with these railroads to pay them any amount. He could, under the terms of this provision—of course he will not do so, and no one expects him to do so—agree to pay these nondividend-paying railroads all of the interest on their bonds and 10 per cent on their capital stock, notwithstanding they had not made a dollar in the last three years. The Senators who object to the first clause of this bill have no objection to the last clause, although it gives the President the unlimited right to make any agreement he desires to make.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not want by my silence to seem to acquiesce in the statement just made by the Senator from Alabama. I do not want to be included in the category of those Senators who would approve of the course which has just been suggested by the Senator and which possibly might be taken by the President of the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Neither I nor the Senator from Utah for a moment would think that the President of the United States would take such a course. I merely say that it is possible for him to do so.

Mr. KING. Personally I do not think that the Government of the United States when it takes over property in an emergency of this character that is nonproductive, that could not under any circumstances pay dividends, should be called upon to pay a dividend upon such property or pay for its use.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly it should not; and the President of the United States undoubtedly would not pay them a dividend, but he could do so; there is not any question but that he could do so if he so desired. This provision is put in here by the very men who are objecting to the first clause of the bill.

To what are they objecting in the first clause of the bill? They are objecting to a limitation that has been put into the bill against the President going above a certain amount in the payment of solvent railroads; that is their objection. They do not object to the President having unlimited power if it is a bankrupt road, but they do object to the fixing of a basis which the President shall not exceed in his making a contract with the dividend-paying railroads. Now, listen to this. The first clause of the bill provides:

That the President, having in time of war taken over the possession, use, control, and operation (called herein Federal control) of certain railroads and systems of transportation (called herein carriers), is hereby authorized to agree with and to guarantee to any such carrier making operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission that during the period of such Federal control it shall receive as just compensation not exceeding an annual sum (herein called standard return), payable in reasonable installments—

"Not exceeding an annual sum." Then it provides what that annual sum shall be. The bill does not say that the President shall pay them that amount; there is no provision in the bill that will force the President to pay them that amount, but it is a limitation on the power of the President to go above that amount in making a settlement as to these dividend-paying roads. I do not think for a moment that the President is going to pay all that the railroads demand and all that they expect; but when you write in the law a limitation on the President's action you have got to make that law broad enough so that he can deal with each individual railroad system that comes before him for settlement.

I might illustrate the situation to the Senator from Utah in this way: There [indicating] is a door coming from the cloakroom. If the Senator undertook a contract to move the furniture out of that cloakroom into this Hall he would have to have that door large enough to bring out the larger pieces of furniture in the room, or he could not get them out; on the other hand, the door would be vastly too large to bring out all the chairs in the room, and it would not be necessary to have an opening as large as that to bring out the smaller pieces of furniture. It is the same in this case. The pyramiding of this limitation is not for the purpose of giving the more successful roads higher pay, but the pyramiding of the limitation is for the purpose of letting the weaker roads get in and make a compromise. If we did not fix a limitation on the President broad enough for him to make a compromise with the roads which, although dividend payers, have not been very successful, which have not made a large amount of dividends, which have not been able to keep up their betterments and repairs, then they would fall out, and he would drive them into the Court of Claims to settle the controversy. Therefore the breadth of this limitation is not to fix a standard to let the big road in, but the breadth of the limitation is to fix a standard by which the President will be able to deal with the weak roads. If the Senator objects to this provision on that account, the only possible basis on which he can object to it is that possibly the President, through his agents, will not act wisely in the matter. If he acts wisely, no man can object; if he acts unwisely, then a legitimate objection would rest.

It is not necessary in this bill, in order to make it constitutional, to give this authority to the President; it is a mere matter of wisdom. Is it wise to trust the President to make this temporary settlement—and I would not be willing to provide for it if it were to be permanent—with these railroads for the period of this war to avoid litigation, to keep them going concerns, and to take care of the present situation, or is it unwise to give him that power? If we are going to give him the power, we must not put such limitations on that power as will let him make compromises with certain big, strong roads and will prevent him making compromises with the weaker, smaller roads, and drive them into the Court of Claims to get their just compensation. That is all there is involved in this clause. If we are not willing to trust the wisdom of the President in the matter of a temporary agreement, then that clause ought to come out of the bill, and it could come out without endangering the constitutionality of the bill. For my part, I believe, as a temporary measure, it is wise to allow that discretion to rest with the President, believing, as I do, if the bill passes in this form, that this whole question must come back to the Congress in a very short time for our final disposition.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. KING. The point to which I directed the Senator's attention awhile ago could easily be covered by an amendment to the bill reading somewhat like this: "That the President of the United States is authorized to make settlements with all railroads that shall be taken over under the provisions of this bill, paying to them an amount as a standard amount which is the average of their earnings for the three years ending June 30, 1917: Provided, That no road shall receive in excess of 5 per cent or 6 per cent upon the capitalization of the road." That would obviate the criticism I suggested a moment ago.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know that it is contended by very distinguished Senators that a railroad corporation because it is a public-utility corporation does not stand in the same attitude, so far as its property is concerned, as other property owners of the United States; but, knowing the distinguished career of the Senator from Utah on the bench in his own State, I am surprised to hear him adopt that argument. The Senator knows as well as I know that the Congress has no power to fix what "just compensation" is; that we can not prescribe a rule of what just compensation is, and then make the aggrieved party take it. This bill does not attempt to do that. But if the amendment the Senator suggests were put in, it would either make the bill unconstitutional or it would mean nothing on its face, because it is apparent that if it attempted to fix 5 per cent as just compensation it would not stand the test of the courts, and, on the other hand, if it is provided that a settlement should not be made for more than that amount, it is folly to say, if a railroad corporation were making more and knew that it could establish a greater claim in the Court of Claims, that it would accept it from the President.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. KING. In the suggestion which I made I did not intend to imply the idea that the railroad companies would be compelled to take the amount that I named. I merely intended to convey the idea that the President could be authorized to settle with the railroads that were taken over with certain limitations, but that, if they declined to accept the tendered settlement within those limitations, they would have their recourse to the courts, as by the bill provided.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure the Senator meant that, and I recognized that when he made his statement, although his first statement did not cover the ground which he has covered in these last statements. The Senator, however, can readily recognize where that leads to. You either want the President to compromise these cases or you do not. If you want him to compromise with one railroad, you want him to compromise with all. If you want to avoid litigation in the Court of Claims with one set of railroads, you want to avoid litigation in the Court of Claims with them all.

It is impossible for the Congress to understand all of the conditions and facts that surround each one of these railroads. It is impossible for us to ascertain what would be just compensation at this time. There are a thousand circumstances and a thousand conditions that surround the case.

Why, I can illustrate in this way: If you had a ship that the Government was going to take over, and was going to take it permanently, and take your capital, based on the value of the property, one of the material questions involved would be the cost of the ship. But if the Government was only going to take it over for the period of this war and no longer, and return it to you after the period of the war, and possibly you had paid for it or a part of it during the high prices of the war, and during the war the rental value of that ship was very high, very much higher than would be commensurate in times of peace, do you think for one moment that, if it were the temporary rental value the court would not take into consideration its present rental value in fixing the value of the temporary taking, whereas if it were the permanent taking for all time to come, the payment for the value of the property, the present rental value might be infinitesimal in the consideration of the court in fixing value.

There are but one or two ways in which we can fix limitations in this bill that will work out justice all along the line. There are just two things that you must do. Of course, in the last analysis, the court is the proper place to have this question decided; but for a temporary taking, and for questions of expediency, we think it wise to have it temporarily settled by the President.

If that is the case, there is but one thing that you can do in the matter, and that is to leave the question of the value for the temporary taking to the discretion of the President; for if you do not, you are going to exclude from the consideration of a compromise a large number of the railroads of this country, and drive them into the courts.

Mr. President, it has been stated a number of times in debate and in the papers that the cause for taking over the railroad systems by the Government was congested traffic conditions in the United States, which made their taking over necessary. If that were all involved, if that had been the only question that it was necessary for the Government to consider, I do not believe it would have been necessary to take over the railroads to clear up the congested condition of traffic that existed last December and to large extent exists to-day. In the first place, the congested traffic conditions only related to a portion of the roads in this country and a part of the territory of the country. It is true that where the congestion was worst was right at the neck of the bottle where the stream had to flow out. I am not prepared to say that the congested condition was due to mismanagement on the part of the railroads. I am not prepared to say that the war board selected by the President, representing the railroads, which operated them for eight months, could not have relieved the situation as far as congestion was concerned if they had received other necessary legislation to take care of the situation.

Take the country west of the Mississippi River: There was practically no congestion there, and the traffic was greatly increased. Was that due to war conditions? Yes; and due to other conditions. One condition was that the increased price for shipping and freight rates across the Atlantic had attracted all the ships from the Pacific coast and those in the intercoastal trade to the Atlantic Ocean for business. There was practically no water transportation left a year ago through the Panama Canal between the western coast of the country and the Atlantic seaboard. What was the result? A very large amount of business which has been going by water heretofore, either through the canal or around the Horn, was driven across the continent on the railroads.

Those western railroads took care of that situation. In the main, the southern railroads took care of the situation; but the difficulty that confronted the country was not altogether the fault of the railroads nor the fault of the Government. To a large extent it was the fault of the shipper and trade conditions which existed before the war. Most of the ships doing business with Europe insisted on coming to the ports of New York and Boston to get their cargoes. European freights had to go to the port where the ships went. They could not go to any other port. It would have been folly to send freight destined to Europe to the port of New Orleans or Mobile when the ship to carry it was not in Mobile or New Orleans but was in the port of New York. More than that, the foreign governments which are now our allies had been purchasing large supplies of material in this country for nearly three years before we became involved in the war, and for some reason they insisted that the port of shipment in the main should be the port of New York and had their shipments of iron and steel and other war munitions sent to that port, so that before last summer was over the congested condition around the port of New York was apparent. It did not take a prophet to tell what was coming. All a man had to do was to ride up the Pennsylvania Railroad and look at the terminals around Jersey City and New York and know what was going to happen, with thousands and thousands of freight cars standing on the sidetracks because there was no ship in which to unload their cargo.

This was not the fault of the railroads. It was not the fault of the Government, because up to that time the executive branch of the Government had not taken the authority to handle that situation. As a matter of fact, to some extent it was the fault of the laws of the land, because the law in times of peace, to protect the rights of the shipper, has provided that the shipper might designate the line of shipment for his freight; and even the transportation company did not have the right to divert that freight. Now, it is true that with Executive sanction the Railroad War Board did in the last month or six weeks of its operation really violate the law by directing those shipments along channels that were not directed by the shipper himself.

But, in my judgment, that was not the real cause or necessity for the taking over of the railroads. By proper legislation the question of congestion could have been relieved, and will be relieved. The real cause for the taking over of the railroads, in my judgment, was a question of finance.

The Commercial and Financial Chronicle list of October, 1917, shows the following maturities of railroad obligations:

1919	188,213,052
1920	186,526,253

Making a total of $998,251,415 of railroad securities that will mature in four years.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if that includes short-term notes and all obligations?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it does. However, I will not attempt to answer that, because I am not sure about it.

Mr. KELLOGG. It may be that it does.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I gave my authority, and at least that much is falling due. It may be more.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think possibly it does, because most of the notes are short-term notes. The only reason why I asked the question is that somebody before the committee estimated the obligations falling due in 1918 at $225,000,000; but that estimate may have been wide of the mark.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There was a larger estimate before the committee. I have taken the more conservative one, and this has not been questioned by anyone. So that the railroads of the country and the country itself were facing the condition last December of at least $182,000,000 worth of railroad securities maturing this year and a billion dollars' worth of railroad securities maturing within the next four years.

Under normal circumstances there would have been no difficulty in the country in absorbing most of those securities, and the renewals would have been made. It is true that the railroads of the country, by reason of many circumstances, have found it more and more difficult each year to renew their obligations at low rates of interest and were, from year to year, compelled to pay higher and higher rates of interest on their maturing obligations. Nevertheless, I am satisfied that if the war had not taken place, when these obligations matured they could have been renewed at some fair and reasonable rate of interest.

But with the conditions that now confront the country, the necessity on the part of the Government to issue bonds to carry on this war, the fact that we have already issued a large number of bonds; that we have raised the Government rate of interest to 4 per cent; and that it is expected that we will be compelled to issue at least $10,000,000,000 worth of bonds between now and the first day of next July, it is readily seen that it was a matter of impossibility for the railroads to renew these obligations. They would have been compelled to default on the principal, because they did not have the money with which to pay the principal, and they could not sell a 4 or 5 per cent railroad bond in competition with a 4 per cent Government bond.

Therefore one of two conditions of necessity must happen. Either the Government of the United States had to take over the railroads and finance these securities during the period of the war or the Congress of the United States had to declare a moratorium and provide that no suit should be brought on any of these bonds to foreclose them during the period of the war, and a reasonable time thereafter, if they wanted to continue the operations of the great railroad systems of this country and not throw them into the hands of receivers.

Now, you might make an argument on either side of that case, as to which was the wiser thing to do. You might make an argument on either side of this entire problem of taking over the railroads, as to which was the better course to follow; but something had to be done. I do not think there is a sane business man in the United States who does not recognize the fact that in December last it was necessary to do something. The President of the United States, in his wisdom as the Chief Executive of the Nation, decided on the course to follow. A captious critic may criticise him for the course he pursued. But that is a mere matter of contention. If he takes the other horn of the dilemma and pursues the other course the captious critic might have said what he ought to have done was to take over the railroads. So I do not think it is a question for us either to criticise or to contend about. The Chief of the Nation found himself confronted by a situation that required action. He took the action that he thought was wisest and best for the Nation, and I believe it is the part of Congress to recognize it in good faith and vitalize and take care of it for the emergency of the war. If we do so, and limit it as a war emergency, I do not think anyone can expect or will receive criticism from the American people.

Mr. President, I have spoken much longer than I expected. There is but one other question which I think is very vital to the bill that I wish to touch upon before taking my seat. I do not care about the details. They are important and should be well considered, but it is not the details of the proposition I am contending for—it is the proposition itself; and that is the question as to the making of rates for freight and passenger traffic during the term of the war or the life of the act. When the proponents of this measure brought the bill before Congress and the committee they proposed that the President—which, of course, meant his agent—should have the unlimited right to make and remake the freight rates of the United States. I believe that is a most unwise provision and would be a most unfortunate provision if it were enacted into law.

In the first place, under the terms of the bill the President has taken over the railroads primarily for governmental purposes, to move the troops, to move the munitions, to move war supplies, and secondarily to look after the great business interests of this country which must be protected and taken care of if we do not involve the country in a panic.

Now, so far as the governmental function is concerned the question of making rates is of no importance whatever. It is not a practical question at all, because it is unimportant as to what the rate is when the Government has rented all the railroads and is paying a rental value for them and is going to pay the rental value whether the railroads make the money or not, and all the profit that the railroads make above that rental value is going into the pockets of the Government. So far as Government freight is concerned, whatever the freight may be, you are paying it out of one pocket and putting it into the other. So the question of freight rates and passenger rates is merely a question that involves the private business of the United States.

I am not here to contend that the rates are too high or too low. Possibly there are some rates that are too high and possibly there are some that are too low. We all concede that under our present system of partial regulation of the railroads the transportation system of the country has broken down in the main, and that after the war is over and after these conditions have passed there must be a reorganization of the whole system of Government control, and that it shall be put on a basis that is more responsive to the needs of the business of the shipping public and more inviting to the capital of the country to secure the money for an extension of present railroad systems, but to-day there is no war power involved in this question of making rates. There are no war necessities involved in the question of making rates. It is solely and simply a question as to whether we are going to allow an agent of the executive branch of the Government to interfere with the existing system of rates established by law.

Some people say if we are going to take over the railroads it will cost us more money for the Government to run them than for the railroads to run them. That may be true and it may not be true; but, assuming that it is true, they then say that if it is going to cost more money to run the roads the traffic of the country ought to pay it and the people of the country ought not to be compelled to pay it out of the Treasury of the United States. That is a legitimate argument and one that I am not prepared to dissent from, but if that situation is properly presented to the constituted authorities which are now established by law that argument is just as good before the Interstate Commerce Commission as it is before the Senate of the United States. If it becomes necessary for a general increase of rates in this country, I do not think there is a Senator here who would contend for a moment that the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission are not men of patriotism and business judgment who would respond to the needs of the country and if necessary to properly conduct the business of the railroads under the Government would increase the traffic rates of the country sufficiently to meet the transporation requirements under Government control.

But the thing that alarms me is this: The whole business fabric of the Nation is built upon the transportation system of America. The freight rates in this country are the basis on which every business condition in the United States to-day rests. Interfere with that existing condition of business based on traffic rates and you might just as wisely interfere with the blood flowing through the human system and expect the heart to continue to functionate as to expect the great business interests and the small business interests of the country to go ahead and prosper, if you are going to allow somebody unwisely and inconsiderately to interfere with the rates on which the transportation of that business is based throughout the United States.

Now, I do not for a moment think that any agent of the President would intentionally or deliberately change rates in this country which would disturb business conditions and bring about a panic or bring about serious losses. No; such a thing is unthinkable. But we do not know who is going to be appointed by the President to determine the rate question. We do not know, in the many responsibilities and cares that rest on the President, whether he will be able to select men of wisdom and understanding or whether he will select men of sentiment and impulse. But we do know that we have a system erected in this country to-day which is established by law, maintained by law, and which the very business life of the Nation is accustomed to and is conducting its business under, and why disturb it? Why take any chances about it?

The bill does give absolute power to the President to conduct these railroads, if he thinks proper, so far as their control and management is concerned. The only limitation that is put in the bill is the question of freight. That only concerns the private shipper, and even there concessions have been made. To-day the railroad may initiate a rate. The rate can not go into effect under protest until the Interstate Commerce Commission passes on it and agrees to it.

Under the terms of this bill the President is placed in the shoes of the railroad company. He is allowed, as they are allowed under the law to-day, to initiate rates. The Interstate Commerce Commission under the terms of the bill have a right to review the rates made by the President and set them aside if they do not think they are reasonable and just. The difference is, though, that the President can under the bill initiate a rate and that rate will stand until the Interstate Commerce Commission sets it aside. Under existing law the railroads can initiate a rate, but it can not go into effect until the Interstate Commerce Commission have given their permission.

Now, we have gone much further in granting the power to the President to initiate rates than really is necessary, but there is no reason on earth for taking away the right of the Interstate Commerce Commission to review a rate made by the President's agent. It is the only course for us to pursue to protect the rights of the ordinary shipper in this country. Take this right and this protection away, take away from the bill the protecting right of the Interstate Commerce Commission to take care of the individual shipper, and some unwise, ill-considered order may wipe out the business of a whole community between daylight and dark.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Alabama, who is a very industrious member of this committee—being a member myself I know what he has contributed to it—does the Senator understand that the bill does not give to the railroads an appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission; does not give them a tribunal of complaint, if they have one?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The railroads really are not involved in the question. It does not concern the railroads, after we have taken them over, as to what the rate is, as far as they are concerned, because we are proposing here to give them a fixed rental. If the earning of the railroad is less than the rental, the Government will have to pay it out of the Treasury. If it is more than the rental, it will go into the Treasury. So the railroad itself is not concerned in any way about this proposition of the Interstate Commerce Commission fixing the rate; I mean directly concerned. It may be concerned in the future.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I have possibly misunderstood the Senator. I thought the Senator's argument was addressed to the fact that he thought injustice would arise by a right granted by the President that might be an injustice to the property of railroads.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; the Senator did not understand me or did not hear me.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said injustice could be done to the people of America; that in times of great events and great powers and great armies and great navies and great railroads we are very apt to drift along and forget that the people of America exist. But they do; they are here; and what I am contending for is that they have some rights left in this Nation and some rights that should be protected and guarded, notwithstanding the necessities and exigencies of war legislation.

Mr. LEWIS. Might I ask the Senator this further question? As I now gather, I misunderstood the Senator; that is clear. The Senator means, if I now understand him correctly, that those who pay the rates, the people, either directly or indirectly, could, in his opinion, be harassed and possibly burdened by what he would esteem an excessive rate, for instance. Then I ask the Senator, assuming such a condition did transpire, does he not realize that under the bill there is opportunity for any complainant to be heard before the rate would go into effect, if he desired to suspend it on the ground that it was oppressive and would likely work injury to his locality? Does not the bill provide an opportunity for hearings?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; that is what I am contending for. The Senator, unfortunately, did not hear the first part of my argument.

Mr. LEWIS. Possibly; but I listened. I may say to the Senator I receive so many forms of protest and contradictory viewpoints from my constituents on this phase that I paused to hear him on this, because it is one on which my own locality is very much confused.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is a provision now in the bill that allows an appeal from the order of the Executive to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and as long as the bill stands that way it is satisfactory to me; but as some gentlemen had contended that those provisions should be removed from the bill, I was addressing my argument to the contention that the bill should be allowed to remain at least as it is written, and that the public have a right to protection in that regard.

I am not contending that the public are going to be so badly hurt by reason of the raising of the rates and the great burden of cost put on them. That is not what my chief fear is; but I know, and the Senator knows, that a slight change in the railroad rates will eliminate the market from one community and give a market to another community. It was stated before the Interstate Commerce Committee in its consideration of this bill that the change of half a cent a bushel in the freight rates of the country would divert the wheat of the West from the markets of St. Paul and Minneapolis and send it to St. Louis. That probably will not happen. There is a community built up with great elevators and great business enterprises based on wheat following the present channels of trade. If an unwise order were made increasing freight rates on wheat to the extent of half a cent a bushel along certain lines of western railroads and the channel of that trade was diverted from St. Paul and Minneapolis to St. Louis, would it not destroy business communities, and destroy them possibly without an opportunity to be heard or an opportunity of present consideration, and it might drive thousands of men into bankruptcy before the error was found out and the condition readjusted?

So I contend, Mr. President, that there are two vital things in this legislation, if we are going to enact it, two provisions in the bill, which must remain within the terms of the bill, if we are going to protect the interests of the people of the United States and protect them properly. One is that there must be a reasonable limitation on the life of the bill after the war is over, that it must be distinctively and fairly made a war measure, so that the Congress of the United States, the representatives of the people of the United States, may have a fair and unbiased opportunity in the future to face this question without limitation, entanglement, or embarrassment; and the other thing for which I contend is that the bill should not be passed unless within the folds of the bill remains the provision to allow the Interstate Commerce Commission to continue to functionate and review any rate that is put upon the people of this country from any source.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, before my colleague concludes I should like to ask his opinion about the provision of the bill which declares that it shall cease and be inoperative one and a half years after the conclusion of the war. I believe that is the language.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What I should like to know is the opinion of the committee, which have been so carefully considering this question, on that point? What must happen before the war does close? In other words, I apprehend that, first, there must be a cessation of hostilities, of actual fighting, and then perhaps long-drawn-out negotiations with regard to the terms of peace, and, finally, we will reach a conclusion that the war has finally ended. Are we reasonable to expect that the operation of the bill shall cease when hostilities cease, or will it come when a final conclusion for peace has been reached and a proclamation to that effect has been made?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Under the terms of the bill as it is now written it is provided that it shall cease to exist, that the railroads must be turned back to their owners, 18 months after the final treaty of peace is signed by the President. So, as my colleague suggests, it may run very much more than 18 months after the ceasing of hostilities. But I am free to say on this subject I do not think I disclose any committee secret in making the plain statement of the issue in reference to this matter, because it has been published in the newspapers already. The committee was very seriously divided on this question. Some of the members of the committee wanted an indefinite period; that is, they wanted a provision in the bill which merely provided that the terms of the bill should continue until Congress legislated, which left it entirely indefinite. There were other members of the committee, like myself, who wanted the railroads turned back to the owners as soon after the termination of the war as it was possible to do so. We carefully polled the committee. We not only took a vote, but we carefully polled the sentiment of every member of the committee, and there was one majority in the committee in favor of a definite termination of the control. There was only one majority. We were having great difficulty in perfecting the legislation for that reason. Finally, as a matter of compromise, we agreed that the act should terminate at the end of 18 months. Fourteen of the 19 members of the committee agreed to that as a matter of compromise. I am free to say, as far as my own views were concerned, I thought 90 days was time enough, but I accepted the compromise and propose to stand by it as a matter of compromise on the floor of the Senate when it comes to a vote.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, I understand my colleague to say that the provision of the bill is that one and a half years after the signing of the final treaty of peace this act shall cease.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the point I wanted made clear. It may be three years after actual hostilities cease.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator is entirely correct about that. It certainly will be longer than 18 months after the last gun is fired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the point I wanted to have made clear.

Mr. SHERMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it is admitted that there is an emergency requiring some legislation of this kind. The act has already been performed taking over the carriers. This bill when passed will be supplemental to that of some time ago, giving additional powers to the Executive, not only in the management of the property but in the preservation of the securities that represent the property and maintaining the earning power of the property itself.

I do not care to discuss the question whether or not the President wisely exercised the power of taking over the property. It is done; it has been commented on here in a way that satisfies me that I can not add anything to what has already been said on that subject.

On the 31st day of January, 1862, an act passed Congress authorizing the President to take over by military occupation the railways of the country. In pursuance of that act the President did take a considerable mileage, not in all parts of the United States, but in such parts as were necessary to use the carriers for the transportation of troops and military supplies. That occupation continued until the 8th day of August, 1865. The President at that time by an Executive order restored the property so taken to the respective owners.

While the act of January 31, 1862, was in course of its passage, a debate in the Senate occurred, in which the following language was used by Senator John P. Hale, of New Hampshire. I refer to this because it expresses more concisely my frame of mind on debating further the wisdom or folly of taking these roads in the circumstances attending that taking. At that time the law of January 31, 1862, was pending in the bill to which the Senator refers. Senator Hale used the following language:

> I am opposed to both the amendments, and I rise here merely to say that it appears to me gentlemen do not exactly appreciate the condition of the country if, when a measure of this sort is introduced, it is undertaken to be subjected to all the criticism which might justly be brought to bear on an act that was calculated to be permanent in its character and to form a rule of conduct for all time to come. We are in a great and trying emergency, and this is a war measure for the immediate necessities of the country.

This was said on the 28th day of January, 1862, shortly preceding the passage of the bill in the Senate. It accurately describes the condition of the country at this time. The country has expanded; there is much more territory, many more States, many more people, many more miles of railway, but it has not changed the essential, underlying principle. As the emergency then was, so is it now.

In the other House, after the bill reached that branch of Congress, I note that Mr. Vallandigham was very solicitous as to the waste of time, and said:

> Why waste time, then, on tax bills? And yet a bill of this character, unheard of before in the legislation of the country, is to be brought up here by unanimous consent on a misunderstanding, and is to be put upon its passage without debate!

After alleging the unconstitutionality of the measure and the extreme character of the interference with private property, he continued:

> I will not call for a count upon the other side, but content myself with protesting against this bill.

This description of conditions in 1862 applying at the present time, it seems to me that I am justified in supporting the measures contained in this bill, whether I am entirely in accord with all of them or not. With some of them, I say quite candidly, I am not. I do not like vesting a portion of the rate-making power in the Executive, thereby impairing or invading by that much the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That commission's power has been builded by legislation supplemental to that of 1887 until there has finally been developed a settled schedule of rates; until there is an established series of decisions; until now the procedure before that body is of a character that can be understood and more readily applied. Uncertainty has given place to certainty in the application of the principles of rate making. So I have myself come to the conclusion that it is unwise to disturb this power.

But, regardless of what my views may be, this is a temporary measure. It is not calculated to take the place of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the conclusion of a treaty of peace. Then normal conditions will resume and we can again discuss measures of this kind, and such additional legislation can be had as will conform to the changed condition of the country upon the resumption of those normal conditions.

The lapse of time after the treaty of peace shall have been concluded of 18 months before the property shall be restored to its owners is another measure that I do not entirely bring myself to support; but, regardless of these and other sections of the bill, that if I were writing the bill for my private satisfaction I should write otherwise, even if these sections are all of them retained in the bill, I shall, notwithstanding that, support it. I do so upon the ground that in this emergency we must, to a very large degree, sink our private differences of opinion to the end that the common purpose may be served, not a month from now or a year from now, but as expeditiously as legislation of this character can be pressed to a passage in this body and in the other House. It is by the promptness of action that we obtain the fullest measure of the value of it.

This will not be a permanent bill. It may in due time be amended. It will end by its own terms in 18 months after the war if not sooner. That is not an arbitrary 18 months to remain under all conditions, but there is an Executive discretion created that will enable the President, if he sees proper, before that time to turn back some or all of the roads to the private owners. I assume that he will use that power discreetly; that it will not be abused; that whatever proper use of that is made will be open to consideration, not only of the needs of the public but a fair consideration also of the private interests involved. So, upon the whole, this bill, I believe, is one that will turn out as much in the way of transportation of troops and supplies and relieving present conditions as is possible by any legislation that can be devised by Congress.

As speedily as possible, Mr. President, I wish to consider the relation that the railroad securities bear to other interests of the country, both public and private. A very large proportion of these securities is in the hands of innocent investors. I know often that an innocent investor is sometimes a sort of a convenient blind to transfer securities and invoke the principle in order to shield the first holder or the author of the securities from the consequences of his improper act. That, however, is not a material element in considering this bill. So far as the public holders are involved, these securities long ago in good faith passed from the original issuing authority and have been purchased, not by those who were responsible for their issue in the first instance, but are legitimate investments into the hands of many individuals and business associations in this country.

I believe I have accurate figures as to railway securities compiled as of June 30, 1915. The holders at that time in the United States, Mr. President, were 626,122. I have no accurate figures since that time, but if I were to take the railway shareholdings of to-day—I am speaking now entirely of shares of stock, and not of other forms of securities—the shareholders probably would approximate nearer 800,000 than the figure I have just given.

Since August, 1914, there has been a steady flow of railway and industrial securities from all parts of Europe to the American market. When the war began it was necessary then, or soon afterwards, to raise large sums by borrowing. Foreign Governments in many instances procured railway stocks and placed them up as collateral for loans that were made in this country, and many individual owners sought in the American market to sell their securities. A vast liquidation immediately set in, so that to-day a larger proportion of the railway securities of the United States is held here than at any other time in the history of the country.

There were, on the 30th day of June, 1915, 842 operating roads, owned by 539,118 shareholders. There were 443 non-operating roads, owned by 87,004 shareholders. These embraced the leased lines which had parted with the managerial power in the property, and have no further rights except the reservation of rent and the reversionary interest at the expiration of the respective terms. The total number of stockholders of classes 1 and 2 and their nonoperating subsidiary companies, taking the classification according to the Interstate Commerce Commission's accounting system, was 608,318, and the total amount of outstanding stock of these roads was $8,524,452,975. The average stockholder had, according to these figures, $14,013 worth of stock. Deducting the 688 railways by or for whom stock of other railways was held and the $2,519,956,813 of shares so held, there remains a total of $6,004,496,162 of capital stock in the hands of 607,630 shareholders. Those shareholders have rights even in war times. Those shareholders are considered in this bill, and properly so.

The underlying principle in the bill, so far as it relates to the protection of private right, is that the property rights of the companies and the shareholders shall be preserved. In addition to that many of the shareholders have pledged their shares for loans. Savings banks, referred to by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], have invested in railway securities. The life insurance companies of the country own railway securities in large totals. I speak now of both stocks and bonds.

I have in mind one life insurance company which I have taken as an instance of the many life insurance companies whose reports I have examined—the New York Life Insurance Co., of the city of New York. In their report of December 31, 1917, that company showed ledger assets at that time of $875,091,343. This is not an aggregation of money and property that is a public menace, large as it is. The greatest individual business enterprises in the United States and in the world in the form of corporate entities are the large life insurance companies. In this country alone more than 33,000,000 policyholders are found and more than 46,000,000 policies are written. Take the New York Life Insurance Co. as an instance, and every other large company writing insurance all over the Western Hemisphere and around the world have the same conditions attending them as to their investments. On the 30th of June, 1917, out of $6,000,000,000 of life insurance assets in the United States more than 25 per cent was invested in railway securities, representing 33,000,000 policyholders and more than 46,000,000 life policies written.

It is well understood that in connection with the insurance companies to which I refer wise laws provide for legal reserves which seek investment. For every thousand dollars of insurance written there must be a reserve, which is the guaranty that stands back of the policy.

The company to which I specifically refer is not a public peril. It, like others, is a highly beneficial institution; it is a mutual company, and in reporting its capital stock under oath, its capital stock is represented by a zero mark; there is no private ownership in the sense that sometimes we refer to such large aggregations as being a public menace. Of the more than $875,000,000 of ledger assets admitted by the insurance superintendent of the State of New York more than 25 per cent on the average named would be invested—nearly $220,000,000 of this single company—in the stocks and bonds of the railways of the United States. These investments are a part of the legal reserve that guarantees, upon the maturity of the policy or the death of the holder, its payment. It is as much a resource to be conserved by wise laws as the funds or investments that come under the national banking act and the Federal reserve system. Every depositor in a national bank has as his security the subscribers to the stock of the bank, its loans and other investments wisely made, which stand equitably pledged as security to the depositors, in the first instance, to guarantee them against loss.

These legal reserves, provided out of the premiums paid by the policyholders, must be invested in some such way as to produce an income. The actuaries compute this security upon some stated per cent—3½ per cent or 4 per cent—of the net income from the investment. So, when these investments are made in railway bonds, they stand as a security, as much so as a mortgage on a farm or a business block in Chicago or in New York. The President, therefore, and his advisers in considering legislation of this character properly kept in mind the safety of these securities in such a way that the legal reserves guaranteeing the payment of the policies might not be impaired.

Furthermore liberty bonds have been sold and another issue will soon be forthcoming. The railway securities of this country are inextricably interwoven with business enterprise. Say nothing of the transportation question at all—that is the primary purpose of the bill, it is true, but leave that out for the present—if the vast issues of railway stocks and bonds, aggregating on the 30th of last June, it is estimated, more than $18,000,000,000, are impaired to any appreciable degree, the credit of the country by the reflex action of the impairment will necessarily itself be impaired. It will diminish the abilty to sell the next issue of bonds; it will interfere with the subscriptions that will be made to raise further funds for the successful prosecution of the war.

It is not merely then a question, Mr. President, of the railways and of their managers, of those who own individually the largest holdings of stock, but it is a question affecting the whole fabric of credit of the country. Credit is a delicate thing; it is easily destroyed, and it is difficult of restoration. The impairment of this vast quantity of securities by a small per cent, not a mere quotation in the market of the shares of those who buy and sell, but an impairment of the securities by unwise legislation, pending or threatened, becomes at once an impairment of the credit resources of the entire country. So this bill proceeds to reassure the general public and the holders of shares that there shall be no liquidation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been interested in the Senator's statement as to the fact that the life insurance companies hold large blocks of railroad securities. The Senator will also remember that the New England States and the State of New York have $6,000,000,000 of the savings of the people in savings banks, and they also, to some extent at least, take these same securities; and the savings banks at the present time are very much disturbed lest the issue of a new loan at a higher rate than 4 per cent may do them very great damage. They ought to be remembered in connection with this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; undoubtedly. I have referred in the briefest possible way to the investments of the savings banks, but in my investigation I have not had the figures given by the Senator from New Hampshire; and I am very glad to have them added to those I have already given, because they are just as material as the preservation of the reserve back of a life-insurance policy. These savings represent the artisan, the farmer, the small tradesman, everybody, and a comparatively small amount to each, but in the aggregate very large.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator that in the New England States and in the State of New York the $6,000,000,000 that are held in the savings banks represent less than $500 for each depositor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. That follows out the usual result in the savings accounts, because they are people of small means. Railway bonds being a part of the investment, the owner of these small savings, the individual who has been prudent and thrifty and laid aside something, undoubtedly is entitled to some consideration in such legislation as this; and the President and his advisers in framing the bill have endeavored to protect them against any depreciation on the market or any ultimate loss when the matter shall have been definitely settled.

In connection with these figures, I wish to refer very briefly to the markets of bonds. I have taken the market on the 26th day of December, 1917, and the 27th of December, 1917, and the high and low markets in 1916 and 1917. Now, while I have never been a habitué of the stock market, at different times some of my friends and clients have. They take the chances on it; but I have investigated the stock market, as well as the grain market, enough to know that there are more things that enter into the fluctuation of the market than any other of the complex products of civilization. I know of nothing that can be affected by such a multitude of conditions. A frost in South Africa, the bankruptcy or receivership proceedings of a railroad, any one of a dozen things that may be reported in the morning papers, may affect the quotations.

There are here 25 railroads, with their average earnings on common stock for the three fiscal years ending June 30, 1917, and the two years preceding.

For instance, on the 26th of December, 1917, on the fluctuations of the market, Santa Fe stock was 78. The 27th of December, 1917, the day of the President's proclamation taking possession of the roads, it rose to 84⅝. Baltimore & Ohio went from 40 on the 26th of December to 51⅝, and so on through. Those roads are not speculative roads. They are not roads that are manipulated on the stock market. The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul is another railroad of that kind; the Chicago & Northwestern, the Illinois Central. Let me take that, because it is included in the sweeping indictment, all these roads together in one universal condemnation, in part of the public press and in some criticisms made of them.

The Chicago & Northwestern never has been a speculative road. It was built out of Chicago into the West and Northwestern country, beginning many years ago. The Chicago, Burlington & Quincy is not a speculative road. It began in the same way many years ago. The original act was passed in 1849. Several roads were independent—the old Chicago & Galena Union, one reaching from Chicago to Aurora, from Aurora to Galesburg, from Galesburg to Quincy, each of them separate companies. They passed through the processes of evolution, uniting, until finally many years ago the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad was formed. It developed as the West settled. It passed the boundaries of the Mississippi River. It extended into Missouri and Iowa; and when I speak of Missouri I remember that the State of Missouri in its history has been literally gridironed with Government roads. The whole State of Missouri has had an experience with Government roads that has satisfied everybody who has read it—satisfied everybody except the enthusiastic zealots who never will be satisfied nor convinced with any experience this side of the grave.

Of all the roads in Missouri built during the craze for internal improvements through which many States passed in the Mississippi Valley every one was a failure. They were run by political pressure. They were built in the shape of a horseshoe, just like the road in North Carolina that is known yet in history as the Horseshoe Road because of its shape. It was a political road. It was a Government-owned road, and it had to pass through the homes of the governor, the secretary of state, and the auditor of public accounts, as I remember the State officer; and in doing so it described a crescent that rivaled that of the Pennsylvania at Altoona. That was a horseshoe curve years before the tourist looked out of a window on the Pennsylvania road to see that marvel of railway engineering. Of all the roads in Missouri that finally became a part of the property of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy but one has a successful record. It is the old Hannibal & St. Joe. It paid out. It had some assets to turn over to the purchasers. The others were wrecks. The history of the North Carolina roads shows the same thing. The history of the roads in Illinois shows the same thing. The original railway of Illinois was built by the State, and it passed through the same melancholy experiences that others did.

Mr. President, I have read the history of the Government roads run by these three States. Within the last 30 days I have refreshed my memory. I have pursued the investigation in many other States, with many other undertakings in our own country, where they have undertaken to run them through as State or Government operated roads.

But to come back to these roads. I do not want to digress too much.

In the case of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, operating at the present time with proprietary or leased lines about 9,300 miles of road, the shares of stock have disappeared. No stock quotation has contained them for some years. They are all impounded and put up as collateral security underwriting the joint fours of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy. They are guaranteed by the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern. Ninety-eight per cent of all the shares of stock of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy road, of one hundred and ten million and some thousands of dollars, are deposited with a trustee as collateral security for the bonds issued jointly by the two roads in purchase of the control of the Burlington road. That was not a speculation. That was a far-seeing development of the greatest single railway system in the world. Mr. Hill had the prophetic insight to see what the acquisition of the Burlington road meant as an eastern—or, to him, a Middle West—connection. Therefore the stock was obtained. The transaction has not been successfully attacked up to this time. The public would receive no benefits if the stock were to resume its quotation on the market and the transaction to be entirely set aside. The traffic arrangements between the Burlington and the two Hill roads reaching the Pacific coast are for the general benefit of the public. Resolving them into three separate and competing lines would do nothing that would help win the war or benefit the private shipper or the traveler. It is enough for us to know that beyond any question there exists in Congress the power to regulate, and we have regulated and are constantly regulating at every session of Congress either the roads or something that affects them, directly or indirectly.

I refer to these shares of stock again. That is what I wish to adhere to as closely as I can on this branch of the subject, and I do not want to take much time here.

The stock of the Illinois Central stood at 86½ upon the 26th of December, 1917, and rose to 91 on the 27th of December. Those speculative values are attacked. It is said they ought not to be allowed. How will you help it? How will you control the market, except to beat it down by unfriendly legislation, and encourage it and raise the quotations by friendly legislation? I see no way to prevent it, nor is it at all desirable to try to prevent it.

"Oh," it is said, "the Government can prevent it if we assume the entire ownership and operation." Well, let us see about that. We have out a large issue of Liberty bonds. Mr. President, what do they sell for? I looked at the quotations this morning. The 4 per cents, with only partial tax exemption, are quoted at low as 96.10. The 3½ per cents, with total tax exemption for all purposes, are quoted at 98.40. That is $984 for a $1,000 bond. Can the Government protect its own credit? Its own securities are selling below par on the market with the guaranty of the Government behind them. If it can not protect its own bonds from market fluctuations, how will it prevent Government railway shares from doing so? If I have a thousand-dollar bond, I can go out and sell it in Washington at 50 cents on the dollar, and the Government can not keep me from it. If the Government can not sustain its own credit at par on war bonds, it can not sustain the railroad bond credit after it has taken the railways and are administering their affairs? It can do no more in the one instance than in the other. After it has become responsible for $18,000,000,000 worth of railroad property, more or less, with the additional bond issue required to finance this war to a successful conclusion, the Government will have reached the limit of safe credit. Governments are no different from any other borrowers. When they become debtors in large sums, their securities are inevitably often thrown upon the market for liquidation. As the securities go upon the market in large quantities, they are bound to depreciate from par.

Let me give you another illustration of what I mean.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Senator forgotten the proposal, which probably will be adopted in one form or another, for the Government to issue four billion more of notes based upon industrial promises to pay, and its effort to maintain the value of those notes?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is certainly very material. Those, in a very short time to come, may be on the market, and the public will be asked to take them. We must sustain, when taken, that credit. If such industrial credits are issued the Government can not keep them from fluctuating on the market. If this bill did not preserve the value of railway securities by adequate legislation, how could we expect to have $4,000,000,000 of future industrial securities subscribed within the next 30 or 60 days? The Senator from New York very properly makes the inquiry. The President and his advisers no doubt very prudently had in their minds the future borrowing necessities of the country when they gave to the bill some of these sections that we are now considering.

I see no crime to be imputed to men on the market who buy and sell under Executive orders, favorable or unfavorable, as the case may be; nor do I see any objection to voting for such a bill in the expectation that the day it passes Congress the stock market will advance, and that every quotable security on 'change affected by this bill will advance possibly as much as or more than the figures I have read. I expect that; nor will that cause me an instant to falter in the support of this and similar measures to protect the credit of the country.

In order to make more impressive the inferences that I am endeavoring to establish from such facts as have been stated, I have to state some additional facts.

The individuals owning outright railway shares in round figures are 1,000,000, and they own more than $10,000,000,000 of railway securities. These are the individual holdings. These figures have been compiled from trustworthy sources.

There are held by trust companies, State and national banks, $865,000,000 of railway securities. There are held in the aggregate by saving banks, with 10,000,000 depositors in the United States, including those to which the Senator from New Hampshire alluded, in New England, $847,000,000 in railway securities, representing the institutions that invest their savings, great or small. There are held by life insurance companies, with 46,000,000 policies in force, held by 33,000,000 people in the United States, representing a total ownership of this alone of over one-fourth of the total resources, $1,550,000,000. There is held by fire and marine insurance companies, casualty and surety companies, a total railway security investment of $649,000,000. Benevolent associations, colleges, schools, charitable institutions, eleemosynary enterprises of various kinds, have invested their endowments, their gifts, both by the living and by the dead, in $350,000,000 of railway securities.

I care not that some people may have large holdings of shares of stock. I regret that some of them may sometimes use their stock improperly. I regret that combinations of large stockholders are sometimes made for the purpose of wresting control of a road for speculative purposes from conservative owners. That is a matter to reach by legislation—not to destroy the innocent and the guilty alike, but to reach the guilty and exempt the innocent from any such legislation of a general character. What I especially think is defective in reasoning processes is to measure all the railroads of the country by a few that have abused the laws of business and have taken advantage of omissions in legislation.

I remember the Chicago & Alton road—and it is often made a horrible example. It was built by the stockholders, without a mortgage, from Chicago to St. Louis. That was the original line, built in the days when Timothy B. Blackstone was the man who promoted it and was the moving spirit with his associates in its construction, equipment, and operation for many years. The Alton paid steadily, in the days of its old-time managers, 7 per cent. Its stock was quoted as high and was worth as much for investment purposes as the shares of any national bank in my country. It was quoted at 175.

The change came. Mr. Blackstone died, some of the shareholders sold out, and along came a new management. The same thing happened with it, in substance, that happened with the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific. A very great increase in shares occurred upon the advent of the new management. It was not a question of how much the property was worth, but how much of the stock or securities could be issued and absorbed by the investing public.

Keep in mind, Mr. President, the fact that when all of the stock gambling was over, the property investment of the Chicago & Alton and of the Rock Island & Pacific was just the same as it was before it started, unless we except some possible depreciation on lines that were not kept in repair. The property investment is the source of earnings, not capital stock, not bonded indebtedness. The source of earnings is always and must remain the property. How much it earns depends upon many things, but, providing the road reaches from its initial point to the terminal point favorably and traverses a productive area, the two salient features of every successful railway are its property investment and its managerial ability. The earnings of the Alton and the Rock Island on the property investment remained the same or advanced or receded according to the prosperity, or the reverse of it, of the several years. The Alton, however, put out a great number of securities under the new management. Their stock fell to a low figure consequent upon that dilution. The same thing, in substance, happened with the Rock Island.

It is argued here that these incomes or earnings of certain conservative roads are unduly large. As I remember—just quoting now from my recollection—in 1916 the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy showed an earning on its capital stock of nearly 27 per cent. It is selected as one of the shocking examples on the floor of the Senate Chamber. The Burlington road has been a conservatively managed road from its inception. It has never watered its stock. On the contrary, its stock is boiled down; it is concentrated rather than diluted. It has not followed the policy of issuing new shares as the country has grown up commensurate with its advanced lines that were pushed out into the frontier. As values have increased they left the capitalization at the same figure as many years ago. The Burlington has, in round figures, $110,000,000 capital, with $179,000,000 of bonded indebtedness. That $179,000,000 is actually in the hands of the investing public. They have a total property valuation—to say nothing, now, of the capital stock—of more than $530,000,000 in the single road under one management.

With $530,000,000 of a property investment, the earnings of the road are necessarily nearly 27 per cent of the capital stock of $110,000,000. If the Burlington road had followed the processes of the speculative roads, or if the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern had followed the processes of other speculative enterprises, they would have increased their capital stock many fold. Instead of their stock being quoted on the market at par or more than par in normal times it would have fallen like the Alton and the Rock Island, to one-half, to 35 or 40 cents. They did not do so. The very fact that the former-named roads were conservatively managed makes the earnings on their capital appear unduly large. If they had watered their stock, if instead of $110,000,000 the Burlington had had $500,000,000 of stock, then their earnings for the year 1916 would be nearer 5½ per cent than 27 per cent. They have not done so, nor do I think, Mr. President, that ought to be used as an argument here that the conservative railways shall suffer for the comparatively small number of roads that have done otherwise.

I now speak of the Illinois Central. The Illinois Central is a land-grant road. It is like the Pacific roads—the Union, the Central, and the Southern. Each alternate township for the whole length of Illinois was given to the Illinois Central Railroad to build by an act of Congress. At the time the land was given there was little population in that State. When the Union Pacific road was built the great West from Council Bluffs to the foothills of the Rockies and beyond was a wilderness.

Some Senators forget—older ones do not—the conditions at that time. I was impressed with what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] said of the 53 years since he went to that State. He saw as much or more of this development than I have seen. I have seen prosperous communities of several thousand persons assemble in opera houses or halls and bid to railway men for a line of railway to come through. They were tired of hauling their merchandise in and their produce out by wagon road and animal power.

It is true that there have been abuses in land grants. At the time the lands were given, in most instances, however, the Government thought it was driving a good bargain, and it was. That country was a wilderness when James J. Hill went into Minnesota, and with a prophetic vision, which made him one of the greatest railway men in the world, saw in the long years to come what the settlement of the vast Northwest would be. He staked his fortune upon it and the efforts of all his years. He was a railroad builder, not a stock speculator. All those conservative roads that have kept their property valuation well within or below their capital stock were managed and instituted by men of the Hill type. They were the great railroad builders of the continent. They had confidence in their country; they had sound business judgment. They assembled about them the technical ability to construct, equip, and operate railways.

Why should they, Mr. President, be stigmatized here in such terms as I have heard? Peace to their ashes! They were of a mighty race of men. They belong, Mr. President, to a generation the like of which does not live here to-day. They were conservative; they knew their business. None of those men in their lifetime were ever justly accused of being public enemies. The world was better for their having lived. The Illinois Central likewise was a land-grant road. It was built from Chicago to Cairo originally and later on, by extension and normal growth, it reached New Orleans. It has numbered among its executive heads some of the most distinguished railway men of the country. Commissioner McChord, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in his last report gives the Illinois Central a clean bill of health. He says it was operating its road under normal conditions and meeting fully the demands upon it as a common carrier. Within the last five and one-half or six years the Illinois Central has spent more than $80,000,000 in track facilities and equipment. It now has under contract or is coming in on contracts at stated intervals as they can be completed more than $15,000,000 worth of cars and equipment of that kind.

When it is said that the railroads failed, that they broke down under the test of war conditions, the reply is that in many instances they did not fail, as in the one I have given. In others of the West and Northwest and of the far West the roads did not break down. Their cars were taken away from them; their engines were withdrawn from the roads; their equipment was taken; it was collected largely in the eastern district. There was a vast concentration of cars, engines, and equipment of that kind all along the Atlantic coast.

In an investigation of a certain committee on shipbuilding conditions it was shown that more than 1,300 loaded cars were on the sidings at one time at one shipyard in the United States along the Atlantic coast. At the same time more than 3,000 loaded cars were on the tracks on their destination for this same shipyard, arriving daily, so that any unloading of the 1,300 that were congested at that point made but little impression on the constantly arriving cars for the same point. The railways going out of Chicago, St. Paul, St. Louis, and Kansas City did not break down. Their equipment was taken away from them under the stress of war conditions, and they were rendered incapable of using their own equipment and rolling stock for the operation of their road. Even under normal conditions a railroad man knows that these must be constantly watched.

The West and the Northwest send more crude merchandise into the market than the East—breadstuffs, meats, agricultural products, lumber, coal, minerals, ore in its cruder form, unmanufactured, in billets or pigs. In that form it requires more car space. Therefore the cruder merchandise coming from the West, headed for the East and for manufacturing points centering in and around Chicago and east of there, necessarily draws from the West a large part of the freight power of the roads.

When it comes east it takes a given time for the empties to return to the West. Under war conditions, with no attention paid to demurrage, with the long delays of railways on sidings and at division points, when the loaded cars came to the eastern district, especially to Atlantic coast points, they stayed for an indefinite time.

Still, all this is charged up to the roads as their failure. I have not a share of railroad stock nor a railway bond or security of any kind in the world. My constituents have insurance policies, deposits in savings banks, money loaned on various forms of railway securities as collateral in State and national banks. It is part of the general business of the country. For the railways I say but little. It is unnecessary. I can talk of them merely as the agency by which the securities must finally be maintained at their proper value or depressed. Whether they do so depends upon the treatment they receive in this and similar legislation.

I do not wish to take much time, Mr. President, about the conditions of a legal character that surrounded the railways. I can not pass, however, without alluding to it. I remember when the Interstate Commerce Commission act was passed in 1887 and the struggles that occurred in the various amendments made to it, especially the Hepburn Act of later days—1906, as I remember now—and all the legislation that has been thrown around railways, both State and national. I sum it up by saying that the railways have been operating in a strait-jacket for many years. It began years ago. I remember the granger agitation that began in Illinois and Iowa, first in State constitutions and later in the Munn cases, in the Bowman cases, all those that first established the right of the State or the National Government to regulate railways, took them out of the catalogue of strictly private enterprises, impressed them with a public interest, and made them subject to governmental regulation. Kansas passed through a similar era. That was a distinct forward step. It was a remedial process. It was needed. Some railroads had abused their power. I never apologize for them and for such conduct.

Then the Interstate Commerce Commission was created in 1887 with various amendments that I will not enumerate. The antitrust law came in 1890. Following several years after the passage of the antitrust law there was the Western Passenger Association decision. That was a combination of roads in certain western territory for the purpose of maintaining rates. It was the famous so-called "gentleman's agreement." It was held to be within the antitrust law, although there was considerable surprise in legal circles among many lawyers to learn that the antitrust law could be extended and applied to railroads. But nevertheless the court so held, and accordingly the railroads have been under the operation of that act since not only in our own country but they have been prevented from giving preferential rates in the development of foreign trade. I remember a railroad going out of Chicago whose managers were fined heavily for a preferential rate on tin-plate shipments into Canada. The preferential rate was made for the purpose of assisting in the export trade, without which it could not have been developed. Our manufacturers wanted to get some of the Canadian business, and in order to do it they asked the preferential rate to meet Canadian conditions, and it was decided that it was contrary to law and fines were imposed of $10,000 as the result.

Rate making has been a constant debate. The roads have been before the Interstate Commerce Commission until very recently year after year, time after time, every time rate making is agitated. In all this the railways finally have settled down to a certain schedule fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. No material changes have been made save an increase in one territory for some time, but in all this increase in prices of everything, labor and material of every kind, there has been no commensurate increase of rates to enable the carriers on their earning power of the property invested to advance to keep pace with the increase of operating cost and maintenance and depreciation.

To my mind it is not a matter of surprise at all that the roads made a bad showing. It is true these figures are quoted here, the 27 per cent, for instance, earned on the capital stock, but if the 27 per cent be figured upon the property valuation it is not an undue return for a business that contains as many hazards as operating a railroad, and especially when it concerns such vast sums of money as are invested.

The congestion in the eastern district came as a natural result of piling up merchandise as indicated. Any failure of the railways was more a failure of the Government to recognize conditions and grant the relief before taking them over than it was a failure on the part of the roads. It is true that the roads could not meet the demands made on them, and especially last winter, that has been a very inclement one, blocking ways, making it impossible to obtain coal and fuel supplies generally, difficult sometimes even to transport tank cars with fuel oil. All those things have happened, it is true; but has the Government done any better? If improvement come it will be the result of the release from obsolete laws and the strait-jacket of overregulation.

We passed the food law here. I did not vote for it, and I am glad of it. I would not vote for it if it was up again. I have no apologies to make for my conduct in that particular, except to repeat it the first chance I have. But the Government is given plenary power under this measure. We have a Food Administrator and a Fuel Administrator. They have had power at any time since last April to commandeer the roads—the carrier system, coal roads, and ordinary roads, all together.

A few days ago the heatless Mondays were revoked, and we are now living on Monday just as we do on other days. Here is what Black Diamond says. It is the coal paper of the country, published at Chicago. It is not owned by coal operators, either, Mr. President. Black Diamond is a periodical devoted to the coal business, and it represents a coal miner as much as it does a coal operator:

Three million four hundred and fifty-six thousand tons of coal were saved in the United States during the eight "fuelless days" under the recent order of Fuel Administrator Garfield, but at a cost to industry of $289.35 for every ton saved.

This is an old illustration of saving at the spigot and losing at the bunghole. The highest-priced coal in the world was produced under the fuel order that was revoked a few days ago. Two hundred and eighty-nine dollars and thirty-five cents a ton of a loss is something that even a wealthy country like this can not stand all the time. We may stand a little of it, but we have now had a plenty.

The total loss during this period in wages and manufactured products was placed at more than $1,000,000,000.

Figures of the industrial agent of the Baltimore & Ohio Railway give the value of the fuel saved under the order in 18 of the larger cities of the country at $137,377,589. The loss in wages and manufactured products in these cities was put at $4,344,070,000.

Here is a town of 70,000 in the center of the coal belt—Springfield, Ill. Here is a telegram from the fuel administrator that certainly deserves preservation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., January 23, 1918.

Senator L. Y. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Our record for five days' obedience to fuel order shows saving of 40 tons of coal per day. Loss in wages alone per day over $11,000—

That is expensive coal, even where we wagon it up and put it in our coal bins at home. I have not gotten coal out of a car for 12 years. The motor truck or wagon goes out to the mine and brings it to my house and dumps it into my basement. Thus the carrier system does not bother us any. But they stop them all. The factories there are served by motor cars. There is not a railway car in some of our factories that operate three shifts of hands that ever take a coal car to fill their coal yards or stock up in summer time. They were guilty of hoarding, every one of them, because along last summer, when the coal business was slack, they stocked up enough coal to run them until next April. They were shut up; they had to stop, just like the rest of them—

Utilities company electrical distributing station supplying power to most of our factories shows a saving of only 12 tons of coal per day on account of generating live steam in place of consuming exhaust for use in heating system. Six coal mines within city limits prohibited from supplying fuel, and car supply not sufficient for the output. We are actually prohibited from serving our city, State, and Nation under the order. We plead for exemption for Springfield and Sangamon County that we may perform a greater service.

Our citizens obeying Fuel Administrator's regulations; are convinced they are not applicable here—and work great hardship. Coal saving negligible. Regulations retard production.

Nobody thought they were at any place—

CENTRAL ILLINOIS COAL BUREAU,
O. G. SCOTT, Secretary.

If the Government does that on coal, what will it do if in time of peace you leave it in possession of the railroads? If the railroads broke down this last winter in their carrier service, what did the Government do when it undertook to distribute coal?

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] referred the other day, I thought very properly, to the price at the mines that was fixed by Secretary Lane and his associates. Immediately following the publication of that price the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and afterwards the Fuel Administrator denounced the price as excessive. The Fuel Administrator intimated to consumers of coal to wait; do not fill up during the fall before cold weather sets in, because it would be much cheaper; he thought the price of coal ought to be down to about $2 or $2.65 a ton. So everybody quit, nobody filled in. They were waiting for the cheap coal.

The Government has broken down as much as the railroads have broken down. It was a great undertaking on the part of both. Some degree of liberality can be exercised in judging of each of them, both the Government and the roads.

I do not care to discuss the standard return, because members of the committee who have followed that through the hearings before the committee have done so to my entire satisfaction at least. The chairman of the committee has given in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a very compact and lucid statement of the reasons underlying this bill and the recommendations of the committee in its report. In the main I subscribe to those reasons as well as those of other members of the committee who have presented their views, because of their superior means of information. The standard return is satisfactory to me. I am willing to vote for it and take the chances. It has been changed, but not materially so in the bill as recently introduced and the bill as it came out of the committee. It has followed in each instance the method of accounting adopted by the Interstate Commerce Commission. So these methods, I think, will preserve the value of the property unimpaired, as far as we could do so under a war condition. The provisions of the bill and the observance of the standard return provided will preserve the securities so that no great hearings will occur and no losses in these money investments will happen.

It is with some regret that I turn aside from the admitted purposes of the bill to discuss section 13. I wish for my part that the 18 months were a shorter period. But I am content to take it as it is. The 18 months may be shortened, if proper conditions present themselves, by the President using his discretion. If section 13 as written in the original bill is restored to the bill, I shall vote against the bill with as much enthusiasm as I did against the food bill. Section 13 as originally written contemplates an affirmative act of Congress before the roads will be restored to their owners. It thereby throws, dependent somewhat on the length of the war, the whole railway system of the country and all these investments of which I have spoken into the maelstrom of a political campaign. I am not willing to do that. I wish some time fixed, even if it be 18 months, when automatically the property will be returned to its owners.

I am told, and I have heard it many times before it was mentioned in this Chamber, that the Government ought to keep them. I am very much of the opinion of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who in a very capable address in constructive criticism of this bill pointed out some things that undoubtedly ought to be very well considered here when we come to an amendment, that the discussion of public ownership and operation of railways was not properly involved in this bill. He is entirely within bounds in saying so. Still it is very difficult to discuss this bill by those who favor Government ownership and operation without covering that ground. Accordingly something has been said already, and possibly some more will be said before the final roll call is had on the bill.

It is said that this is a progressive measure; that by section 13, or by taking it and keeping the railways in perpetuity, it is in keeping with the progressive trend of the times.

Mr. President, the most unprogressive, reactionary, backward step in government is the reaching the Government hand out and taking what is essentially private industry. I can not think of anything that is equally unprogressive in all the range of human undertaking. It is said it is new, and we are bidden to look at the countries that are trying Government ownership and how progressive they are. Where are they? Switzerland, Belgium, Australasia, Germany, Austria, Italy, and France. Actually in Switzerland there is the poorest service, with the highest price paid for it, of any other country in the world. In Switzerland and France, where it is supposed the example of public ownership and operation is the likeliest in the world, there is the lowest morale of public service in Europe.

I will say nothing of Germany, except that the service there is not on a par—it is a densely populated country, and it is difficult to make comparisons—it is not on a par with privately operated steam railroads of other parts of Europe or of the world. Germany is given as an example of the fitness of Government ownership to answer the purposes desired.

Germany is a monarchy; Germany is governed by the Kaiser and his advisers. In Bismarck's time he began to develop the policy of taking over the railroads as military agencies, seeing ahead more than 40 years from the time he began it to the mobilization of the German Army in 1914.

In every country that is monarchical the Government roads are more successful than they are under a republican form of government. I do not know of a country in Europe where the railway operatives, down to the last report made before the war in 1914, have as little freedom of action as in Germany. Freedom of speech is unknown; unions are prohibited; they work under ironclad military rule, and, by an edict of the Kaiser, may be conscripted into the service, even if they are not already so regarded, and may be subjected to military discipline in the operation of the roads. That is in time of peace; not in time of war. In ordinary times of peace all of the railway employees of that country may be subjected to military discipline.

It is a pleasing thing to go halfway around the world for our examples. Take New Zealand and Australia, which are the most often cited of all such countries. For practical purposes it would be better if the railways of New Zealand were in some other planet, because they would be more inaccessible. The farther away you can get from the world in the examples the better. The truth is in all Australasia the population is decreasing, the industrial enterprises are lagging, the public enterprises conducted by the State are steadily working out their destined end and show a diminished effectiveness and impairment of service.

Remember, the test is not a few years; all new brooms sweep clean. The test is the same test put upon other human institutions, upon the same things that, devised by human experience, have stood the test, not of five years but of centuries.

When that test has been applied halfway around the world to the Government owned and operated utilities, like steam railways, they are beginning to work out their natural result; the best authorities writing of New Zealand in 1914 say that the tendency in New Zealand for all the public enterprises of that kind is to revert to private ownership; that the governmental owned and operated utilities have been tried long enough to find out that there are some defects in the system that are so vital in character as to condemn them.

Let us consider our own country. It is said to be progressive here in the United States to advocate the Government ownership and operation of railroads as a permanent policy; that because, under the stress of war, we take the roads we must keep them; and a war policy, it is argued, is a good peace policy. I have not forgotten things that have happened in the last 25 years all over this country. There is a bolsheviki of false economy. There has been a multitude of economic dervishes going to and fro over the earth burning with all the fanatical fervor and zeal of orientals. The torchlight fakir is abroad in the land every night; the soap-box agitator is on the boulevards. The stalwart-lunged apostle of a general divide of all human possessions cleaves the air with his resonant bray. It is progressive. Why, it is even becoming fashionable. I talked with a suffragette the other day who told me that she was in favor of the Government ownership and operation of railways. "Well," I said, "do not talk to me about it. I am a suffragette myself now, but if you women folk get to running the railroads I shall not be responsible for my behavior hereafter."

I have seen that motley crew come and go. They began with "Sockless" Simpson, with the whiskered Peffer, with "Greenback" Weaver, with A. J. Streator, and those of lesser fame. All of them shrieked and gesticulated in their time; they had their entrances and their exits; their fads, their nostrums, their universal panaceas for everything that afflicted the body politic and for every disease to which human flesh is heir; a variegated swarm of discontent, a miscellaneous horde, against everybody who had a dollar or a clean shirt to his name.

They had their day. In the far West and in the Mississippi Valley we had the Granger agitation. I remember it when it came in my boyhood days; I heard it all; it is a part of my juvenile experience. We wrote a new State constitution; we had a railroad and warehouse act. The railroads unwisely said that they were purely private enterprises and could not be regulated; but we framed a State constitution, just as they did in Iowa, Kansas, and in some other Western States. We fixed charges for railroads and for warehouses. The litigation went through the courts, and the case of Munn against the State, which was decided by the Supreme Court, and the Bowman case from Iowa, settled the question that railways and warehouses are impressed with a public interest and are subject to Government regulation. Those things all happened in their time. Those were valid reforms; those were elemental in their character; but like all other reforms somebody got the bit in his teeth and ran away with them. It is one of the dangers of hooking up with a radical that you must either travel his gait or be trampled on. So with these railroad and warehouse regulations provided in State constitutions and by acts of the legislatures in Illinois, Iowa, and other Western States, soon the radical and the vociferous brotherhood who always are found bawling and braying in the wake of reform to make it ridiculous, unless guarded by sanity and moderation, came and took possession of the entire proceedings. They proposed to do a great many things. They said "regulation is a failure; legislatures are corrupt; the warehouses not only refuse to obey the law but they join with the railways, and by discrimination and by influencing public officials, practice injustice on the producer and on the shipper as well as on the consumer." So they said let us have Government ownership; and all the way from the foothills of the Rocky Mountains, coming on through "bleeding Kansas," through Missouri, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, and sweeping over the continent until it reached and broke on the Allegheny Mountains, there was the Populist with his impossibilities, with his disregard of the amenities of toilet, and with his ingrowing prejudice against hair dressers and tailors. His principal assets were whiskers and elocution.

Along with him were a multitude of people in the granges. I was a farmer in those days, and I abounded in farmers' meetings, being a boy 12 or 14 years old; but I heard them through. When they finished up, Mr. President, with their harangues, they always had Government ownership for everything worth owning. In a little while the pinch came. Every one of those whiskered reformers, torchlight fakers, howling dervishes, and fanatics from the four corners of all the continent became a greenbacker. They proposed to pay the Government debt—the Civil War debt—by issuing fresh promises to pay upon maturity, and the new promises in turn were to be redeemable in nothing and paid nowhere this side of eternity. That was the sum total of this gentry's fiscal system, the goal of their monetary reform. It found followers; it created a furore. Men were called statesmen who subscribed to their doctrines, and those who did not were almost tarred and feathered by excited gentlemen who mistook their vagaries for financial wisdom in rural districts. The farmer fell for the procedure for a time. He followed it awhile until he found out where it led him. He observed many of the lusty reformers were conscientious objectors to hard work and exercised their vocal cords rather than their muscles. Then the farmer in my section of the country became a conservative, and he is a conservative yet. You can go out and talk Government ownership of railways to him until you are black in the face, and everyone who lived through 1870 and 1874—the Greenback days, the days of repudiation, before the resumption of specie payments, the time when all these things were to happen that were to give him something for nothing—he will tell you that he has heard that before and that he has graduated on that kind of economic science.

Matters went along and all know what we have now—the two ends have connected. The only difference there is under the shining sun between the Socialist and the unlimited Government-ownership apostle in New York or on the plains of the far West is the hair dresser and the tailor. The Socialist in the city, with his reactionary program harking back to the days of Aristotle, is exactly like the old Populist in Illinois and Kansas. Everybody knows what ails them both. He wants something for nothing. He mistakes a disease for a principle and his yearnings for a right to another's earnings; he is a lineal descendant of the same old sire; the same economic blood flows in his veins; and the same political inspiration and fervid ejaculations are found in him that was found in his ancestors of the early seventies. There is no difference between the Socialist of to-day and the Populist in Illinois and Kansas in 1872 and 1874, except that one shaves, cuts his hair, and wears tailor-made clothes, while the other had a rooted aversion to any of the acts named.

Now, we have arrived in this year of our Lord 1918 to the same kind of a proposal. The Populist said then "Everybody is corrupt; every legislator is a horse thief; everybody who has a million dollars stole it from somebody else or he would not have it; he could not have made it honestly." Any accumulation of property was to be frowned on; no one could make anything without taking it away from somebody else. If nobody was rich, nobody would be poor; thrift was to be punished as a crime. Reduce every one to the dead level of mediocrity. Help the human race by pulling down to your level anyone who is above you. Do not try to exert yourself and advance to his ability. Real progress is keeping the industrious from receiving the fruits of his toil so the incapable and slothful may hang on to the coat tails of energy and hard work. We have reached now the same thing. Government ownership of railroads! We are to have it for the same reason—that the railway managers are dishonest, incapable, corrupt government, and know nothing of decent citizenship.

I listened to the eloquent description of my genial friend from California of the one-time deplorable conditions in that State, from which it has recently emerged, I understand. As long as California has such Senators redemption was inevitable. There is no necessity to indulge in such experiments to save California. There is no occasion here for taking a headlong plunge into the gulf of Government ownership just to keep California safe. The Senator, I know, can clean it up again if it should unhappily relapse, and certainly somewhere among our friends it was very effectively cleaned up at the last election.

He said that at one time the State was in the grip of the railroads. Let that be granted. So was Iowa in the grip of the railroads at one time; so was Illinois; and I have heard stories about Ohio.

There are 48 railroad offices in Chicago. As late as 1914, Mr. President, when I had the misfortune to be a candidate, I knew of but three friendly offices out of the 48 in Chicago. So I do not owe the railroads politically a thing in the world more than anybody else; but because of conditions in my State, I do not wish to inflict upon the whole country such an experiment. I myself will remedy any undesirable conditions according to my lights and to the best of my ability, and I know the Senator has done so in California, and is able to do so either now or hereafter.

I know that the railways at one time did meddle in politics; I know that manufacturers meddled in politics at one time; I know that banks meddled in politics to some degree at one time. There were many cures proposed. I heard the initiative and referendum proposed at a conference of Western governors held one night in Chicago. They advocated the initiative and referendum for everything; and Gov. West, of Oregon, who was present, told how it worked in Oregon, where they had initiative and referendum for everything, from deciding cases that the Supreme Court did not know anything about, and in the final decision of which they made a mistake, down to amendments to the fish laws affecting the Columbia River. Every evil was to be cured in that way. Well, they tried that out, but it is a forgotten issue long ago.

At the meeting to which I refer I struck the one discordant note; I was the skeleton at that family feast; I protested against the indiscriminate use of the initiative and referendum, and I rendered myself very unpopular. On that same night the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad opened its Puget Sound extension and ran through for the first time a train connecting with the Pacific Ocean. The next morning the criticism represented by the initiative and referendum league meeting attended by all of those Western governors got two pages in the Chicago newspapers, while the opening of a great continental extension, that ran from the shores of Lake Michigan to tidewater at Seattle, Wash., got 2 inches of notice. That is the way the newspapers sometimes estimate news. There was an undesirable condition, and that was the remedy proposed for its cure; but it is long since forgotten.

Now, we propose to change the remedy and have Government ownership and operation in all States where the railroads have had too much influence. I am not afraid politically of any railroad in the United States. If a railroad fights me or you, you can take the opposition to it and go out and get more votes against it any day in the week. Every intelligent railroad man knows that. That is why some years ago in my section of the country the railroads went out of politics; they learned too much to stay in; their advisers in handling the great properties concerned told them that they had better run railroads and let all the people who had votes run politics and not undertake to impose their individual will upon party voters or party organizations.

We are told that there was corruption in San Francisco. Well, that is not its normal state. It is said there is corruption in Chicago. I presume also that is not its normal state. I have been quite well acquainted with Chicago for more than 25 years, and I do not know of a city council they have had in the whole of that time—and I have seen Chicago grow from a city of 300,000 to a city of 2,800,000 people—that has not been berated by some of the Chicago press as totally unfit, as bordering on bedlam, or as fit for the penitentiary all or a part of the time. They have not had many honest aldermen there in 25 years according to some newspapers.

When the editors talked to me around the clubs about the villiany of some of the aldermen and the politicians of Chicago, I have always said, "Why do you not go out and beat them?" They replied, "Well, we can not." I asked, "Why?" They answered, "Well, we can not get votes enough." "Well, then," I said, "you had better migrate to some country where there is a monarchy. If you can not control votes enough we must shut up and stand it." They say that Mike Kenna is elected alderman and that Bathhouse Coughlin, one of his colleagues, also comes in. Well, they have tried to beat them and have run any number of respectable candidates, according to their version, but they do not get past the quarter post in the race. They can not convince their constituents somehow. The aldermen in the first ward distribute too many turkeys at Thanksgiving. They started in a long way ahead of the election, and with their lodging houses, free-bed houses, free-lunch counters, saloons, and all the other appurtenances that go with metropolitan civilized life, they are able to reach the voter. Then in that section of the country they naturally take up a "high brow" and run him for office. Well, the higher the brows are the lower their temperature, so that they do not get up much heat in a campaign. They do not attract the impulsive voters, and then the editor becomes glum; he goes back into his sanctum sanctorum and indites a fearful screed about corruption in great cities. Well, there is nothing the matter, except that the editor does not know politics in free democratic government. He ought to settle in a ward and get acquainted with his constituents.

Of course, there is sometimes corruption in Chicago. We have had some aldermen that were not quite up to the mark. Some in San Francisco, I understand, have been a little off-color occasionally. Along in the time of Eugene Schmitz and others, who were somewhat distinguished, following out the course of their civic activities as practical politicians they once gave city politics a bad name. Therefore let us have Government ownership and operation of railroads.

Government operation inside of State lines has produced some practical results; but if the Government can not run the railroads, if it takes them permanently, any better than Government has run the State and municipal affairs it has undertaken, then I am right in my opposition, for it has universally failed to produce as good results as private control. Governments can exercise police powers and war powers and affairs essentially public. It can not run what is essentially private business.

It has been intimated that the only way to clean up conditions was to put section 13 back in the bill. I am aware that this seems somewhat aside from the purpose of this bill, which is a war measure and calculated only to provide for Government operation of the carriers during this emergency, but it has passed beyond that and reached a point of discussing the propriety of taking over the roads as a permanent policy, and of course that brings up the whole question. I can not hope to discuss it here as I should like with the amount of freedom that I can in a campaign when that issue is presented, but I have looked up such matters as are near home in my own section of the country. I have read such matters as have come to me as to all of such experiments that have been made among civilized peoples. I have come to the conclusion that it is a dangerous experiment and that it can not succeed.

There are 1,800,000 railroad men in the United States. On the 30th day of June, 1916, there were 517,805 Government employees. At the present time, in all human probability, there are 700,000 Government employees. As a rule, about 60 per cent of them are under competitive civil-service appointment. With 1,800,000 railroad men and with 700,000 Federal employees, there would be, as soon as the railroads are made permanent as Government enterprises, two and a half million voters. Two and a half million voters in the country are about one-sixth of the total vote cast in the United States at the last presidential election. If one-sixth of the total votes cast are in Government enterprises, then the Government is no longer a popular government. According to my observation and experience, there can not be Government ownership and operation of many public utilities. When the employees reach two and a half million there can not be republican government and public ownership and operation existing in the same territory and governing the same people. It is an impossibility. One of two things must happen. Either the Government must control the employee or the employee will control the Government. The last will happen or the employees must be denied the power of organization and political activity.

Organized labor controls this Congress, House and Senate. I think I know what I am talking about. I am no novice on that part of governmental affairs. Two and one-half million Government employees, every one of them in a compact organization! Even the vast powers of the Postmaster General are utterly unable at this time to cope with the postal employees. I sympathize with them in their claims for better wages. I shall support reasonable increases. I do not sympathize with them when they undertake to dictate to a department or to Congress what shall be done. With two and a half millions of employees in this country, I know what will happen. The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] used a phrase here once that described it: That you take the Government out of the hands of the people and put the people in the hands of the Government. There is not a candidate for office, there is not a potential candidate for President in either party, who to-day is willing to stand up and tell the truth about it and take the consequences.

The leaders of the unions, the American Federation of Labor, are loyal and zealous and patriotic in their efforts to obtain service from all the members of that organization. They have failed in many vital times and places to do so. I join with my friend Gompers in his efforts to obtain loyal service from the members of the American Federation of Labor in shipyards, in every industrial plant, and in the railways of the country; yet Mr. Gompers is like Orpheus in mythology. He invoked around him, by the power of his music the savage elements. After he had assembled all of them he became unable to play his instrument, and they fell upon each other and him and Orpheus perished. Mr. Gompers has invoked the spirits, and if he can not play sufficiently, or the conditions do not suit them, destruction threatens. Everybody knows that to-day the one great weakness in connection with winning the war is the inability to get a day's work out of a dangerously large number of the men in the industrial plants and in the shipyards of the country.

The President faces that great problem. Every departmental head knows it. Strike after strike has occurred. Boiler makers, riveters in the shipyards, ship carpenters, workers in industrial plants of every kind, have laid down their tools and walked out for one reason or another. On Lincoln's birthday 5,000 men in a body, not far from this Capitol, walked out because they would not be paid double wages for working on a holiday—a striking method of celebrating the birth of the emancipator! Two days ago other men walked out, and a week before that many thousands walked out, on the open-shop question. They quit their work because they would not work with a nonunion man. The inference is that nobody but a union man has a right to live and remain on the earth.

I have earned my bread by the sweat of my face many a time, like many of you Senators here in your earlier lives. I have worked with my hands, and I can do so again; but if I were in shop or field I would stand up to the last breath I had in my body for the right to live and earn an honest living in this world without joining, unless I wished, anything under the sun to do so. I have a right to live without joining the Presbyterian Church or becoming a Roman Catholic, a Mason, an Odd Fellow, a member of the Mine Workers' Union, or a member of the American Federation of Labor. I have a right to live and remain on earth in any honest occupation without asking any union official whether I can work or not. I will fight for the right of a labor union to exist. I will fight just as sincerely for the right to live and work outside of a labor union. One right can not survive without the other. In time of war their patriotism has overcome their desire to advance the cause of the union. I commend that spirit. Let it influence them all. I join with all of them cordially. I will go with them to the uttermost limits; but when peace is restored the same troubles will return. They can not be avoided by Government ownership and operation of railways. They will be multiplied and aggravated. If the railways are taken over permanently and the conclusion of peace has restored us to normal conditions, then these same problems will be more difficult to solve. We will have the same question again of the 2,500,000 Government employees in a compact union. If now, Mr. President, Congress can be driven into the enactment of the Adamson law, if it can be driven, contrary to the individual judgment of Members, into the support of many unwise measures, what will it be when the Government employees, two and a half million of them, come in serried ranks and a compact body and deliver, through their chosen spokesmen, orders to Congress for legislation?

I know what will happen. One of two things must happen: Either the employees will govern this country or the Government must rule the employees. In both England, New Zealand, Australia, and little Switzerland there are authorities who have had the greatest of practical experience on this subject, who have come to the conclusion that every Government employee in a utility of the kind we are considering must be by law compelled to abstain from political activity. He can vote, but that is the end of his political privileges. He can not become a member of an organization. He can not engage in party activities. He must confine himself solely to voting on election day, and the rest of the time he is a mere employee. That prohibition of activity necessarily prohibits the formation of unions. There is no escape from the conclusion.

I have seen better conditions prevail in California. I have seen them improve in my own State. It is not necessary to make this headlong plunge into the gulf of experiment in order to remove the evils that have existed. I believe in regulation.

I believe the regulated processes of government, acting on these institutions, can remove the evils complained of.

I am as certain as I am of any worldly thing that the highest form of human society is attained through the regulated individualism of the American people.

I never knew a government to discover anything. It appropriates what another in private life discovers. Even in time of war the universal experience is that in every democratic government the red tape must be shot off to get rid of it. Outside of a monarchy, there is no escape from the petrified conditions that prevail in peace times in every governmental undertaking. It is utterly without precedent to think that the Government ever invented anything. The processes of taxation exhaust the ingenuity of all governmental agents. By the time they frame revenue bills, put a tax collector in the field, and pass the appropriation bills statesmen are exhausted, people and the press weary, and governmental processes have arrived at their legitimate end. That is the universal experience of every government on earth, outside of a monarchy. A monarchy grants titles, creates orders of nobility, rewards the discoverer or the inventor or the successful contractor, those who build tunnels and bridges, who make themselves distinguished in some line of human effort. It can stimulate and connect its processes with the best in private enterprise. It can prepare for war secretly.

A republican government can only hope to protect its people. It can not undertake the promotion or interference with the private pursuits a monarchy can. It is a radical difference in the two forms of government. Republic government is unfavorable to the assumption and operation of essentially private occupations. Free government is not devised to support people. It is devised to protect people while they are supporting themselves. It is designed to give the largest measure of individual freedom to man in private life. Some people here seem to have an idea that the object of government is to support everybody, and on that idea there is based this notion of taking over the railroads as a permanent effort and administering them by the Government.

I have taken more time than I ought, and I have only very faintly enforced my views. I wish I could have more time, which I am sure will come in a future campaign, and if I am alive and in health I intend to carry these measures out as I see them to their logical conclusion. I intend to hit the main question.

I want to say to those on the majority side of this Chamber that the great issue is not one of those that have heretofore divided the Democratic and Republican Parties. In the immediate years—not in the next generation, but in your generation and mine—our problem will be to defend civil liberty and the right of individuals under a free form of government to remain and be secure in our possession of private right. It will be to protect it against the agitator, against the socialistic state, against him who intends to absorb every private pursuit by the Government, to destroy the ownership of private property in every form whatsoever, to take it from those who have it and vest it in the hands of a government to be selected by an aggressive minority. An organized minority will always defeat an unorganized majority, and they know it.

There are two forces working. The current will begin to draw your craft, as it will ours. Those who are at the head of large public utilities have been legislated on and hectored and annoyed until I know the sentiment of some of them. They are ready to surrender their property. They are ready to let the Government take it. They know that, unless by armed force, it can not be taken away from them unless there is just compensation, and they are willing to let go. The head of one of the largest public utilities in the world is of that frame of mind. He is tired of the incessant fight to protect the vast interests of which he is the executive head. Joined with him are others of a like mind, and all of them are to-day unconsciously traveling toward the goal of the Socialist. We ourselves, when at the threshold of such a bill as this we are faced with one of the principal proposals of the socialistic state, owe it to ourselves to join with all who believe as we do and defend that institutional liberty and the right of private property and of a government of regulated individualism until there will be no opportunity to indulge in such propaganda and principles as are laid down in section 13 as a permanent measure.

I know what it is. It is proposed to carry that into the campaign, to make it impossible for the owners to have their property until it has passed through a crusade of the kind that will be instituted by the gentlemen whom I described a while ago. I know what that kind of a campaign means, the prejudices that can be appealed to, and the impression that can be made upon a great body of the voters of this country. It is a task that exceeds the 12 labors of Hercules to go before the multitude, the great jury, on a question of this kind and defend the right of private property, of regulated individualism, and of the institutional liberty that we have inherited from our fathers.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it would be entirely possible to admit the soundness and accuracy of most of the statements that have been made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] without affecting one's position whether for or against the pending bill.

The fact of the case is, after hearing the entire remarks of the Senator from Illinois I am somewhat in doubt whether he is for or against it. The most definite thing that I have heard in that respect, I think, was an announcement that I saw of a notice which the Senator from Illinois gave on yesterday that he was going to speak to-day in favor of the bill; so I assume from that that the remarks which he has made are in support of this measure—though it provides for Government control; and his speech was an eloquent and somewhat vehement denunciation of the effects of Government control. The Senator said that it would put upon the Government pay roll some 1,800,000 railroad employees. I think he rather overestimated the number. My impression is that it is some 1,600,000 instead of 1,800,000, but that is largely immaterial. He also said from his inner consciousness—and he emphasized the fact that he was speaking of his own knowledge—that the labor unions of this country control this Congress. I would not have known that if I had not heard the statement from the Senator just now made. Stating, as he does, that he speaks from personal knowledge, I must accept it as true, at least, as to some.

After describing the terrible calamity that would result to the country from this great increase of Government employees he surprises us by stating he is for the bill, which will bring them all under Government control. Though stating he is opposed to Government control because of the power so many employees would exert upon the Government, he proceeds to claim that under private operation of the roads the labor unions control Congress, and he says that the railroad employees, under the old private competitive operation, control, and ownership, forced the Adamson law through Congress. I assume that the condition can not possibly be worse under Government control.

The accounts which the Senator has given of the construction of railroads from Chicago out into the wilderness, paying for them without mortgages, and the subsequent looting and ruin of them, as in the case of the Chicago & Alton, are all most interesting; but it is difficult to see in these circumstances an argument against Government control. I am at a loss as to what application the Senator intends to make of them. I assume that he is going to support this bill, notwithstanding his denunciation of the dire effect of Government control, though the bill provides for Government control, not only during the war but for 18 months after the war is over.

I am not here to argue for Government ownership, though I would not shrink from it if it should prove necessary. I have not the same horror of Government ownership of the public highways as the Senator has, though I think there are other measures, intermediate measures, which should first be tried before we resort to that last extreme. But if I were here to argue for it, I would not be deterred by the experiences that the Senator recites of State roads in Missouri and North Carolina any more than I would be induced to denounce the national banks and the national-bank act because at one time in our history we had the wild-cat currency of State banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield for a question. My remarks will be quite brief.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know whether the Senator was here or not; but I announced on taking the floor, or very shortly after I began to comment on the bill, that I should support it unless section 13 as originally written was restored; that I should support the committee bill, although not approving of all its features.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That was my understanding of the Senator's attitude, and I am still somewhat surprised to know that he is going to do that, in view of his denunciation even of the limited restrictions that have heretofore been placed upon the roads. He says they have been placed in a "strait-jacket," and intimates that they should have been unmolested, along with Hinky Dink, Bathhouse John, and the "normal state of corruption" which he says exists in Chicago. The Senator seems to think that the railroads have been hampered and the country has been injured, even, by any governmental interference. But I think there are very few Senators, Mr. President, who do not favor an even larger measure of Government control. There are probably very few Senators who, if called upon to vote for a permanent railroad policy for this country, would vote to go back to a system of unrestricted private control and operation. There are very few, I think, who would not vote for a more effective governmental regulation of these great public agencies.

There ought to be borne in mind at every point in the consideration of this measure, in the charge that it smacks of socialism, that these properties are not private properties. The Government control which is provided for in this bill is Government control of an agency and function of the Government itself, of public highways of the Nation, and the talk of the seizure of private property, of those things into which no question of public agency enters, has but little application to dealings with the public carriers of the country.

But, Mr. President, I wish to refer very briefly to the bill itself. The procedure of the Committee on Interstate Commerce in dealing with the bill, which was Senate bill 3385, to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, has been somewhat out of the ordinary. One or two very vital amendments or changes in the bill were made by the committee, but instead of reporting them as amendments the committee has embodied them in a new bill—Senate bill 3752. In fact, as the deliberations of the committee proceeded, its chairman has introduced several new bills to embody the result of the committee deliberations, so that in order to reach parliamentary consideration of the changes in the original bill, which have been proposed by the majority of the committee, instead of the burden being upon the committee to propose and carry its amendments, the burden is upon the advocates of the original bill as introduced, who desire no change in certain vital respects to present amendments. I do not think that the bill as worked out by the legal advisers of the Director General, including Hon. George W. Anderson, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, has been improved in any way by the substitute bill offered by the committee. The bill as introduced made no express change in the rate-making authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is true that it was claimed by the Director General that under his general powers he had supervisory control of rates, as provided in the bill, yet that was a matter for legal construction, and it was the avowed purpose of the Director General not to interfere, in general, with the rate-making duties and authority either of the interstate or State commissions.

The bill as originally introduced did not provide for the return of the railroads to private control, but retained the Government control until further action of Congress, thereby giving to the advocates of readjustment of our transportation system, with reference to unification and Government control, the advantage of the present status, and putting the burden of the enactment of additional legislation upon those who favor a return to the private competitive system. The committee substitute bill reverses both of these principles. It overturns absolutely the initial rate-making powers of the State and Interstate Commerce Commissions, and imposes the vast burden of that complicated and technical work upon the President, giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the strange rôle of appellate power over the action of the President. Nothing whatever remains of the rate-making powers of the various State commissions, the entire rate-making field being covered, under the committee substitute bill, by the initial rate-making powers of the President and appellate or supervisory rate-making powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The committee substitute bill provides that "rates shall be fair, reasonable, and just," but does not require of the President, as was required of private operators by section 3 of the interstate commerce act, that no "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any description of traffic," shall be given. Under the previously existing powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission it was its duty to enforce this provision; but as the bill is now framed the obligation of this statute is entirely removed from all rate-making authority, whether private owners, the President, the Interstate Commerce Commission, or the State commissions. The matter is left entirely in the discretion of the President, subject only to the vague and effusive generalization that "rates shall be fair, reasonable, and just." The committee substitute bill provides as follows:

> The President may initiate rates by filing the same with the Interstate Commerce Commission. * * * but the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, upon complaint, enter upon a hearing concerning the justness and reasonableness of so much of any order of the President as establishes or changes any rate.

This destroys the very foundations of the rate-making authority and the legal restrictions upon rates that have been carefully worked out through a quarter of a century of travail.

The matter is left entirely in the discretion of the President. Of course it may be said the President will not abuse that discretion. It is hoped that he will not. But the Senate is supposed to be considering the law, or proposed law, and not individual discretion, whether it is that of the President or some one else. Those who are familiar with the issues which have been fought out between the public, the shippers, and railroad corporation owners and operators during the past generation know of the labyrinth of technicalities, complications, regulations, terms, trade areas, and direct and indirect effect upon communities, firms, and individuals of rates, and the machinery of government which has been built up under the Interstate Commerce Commission for dealing with this labyrinthian subject will readily understand the absolute impossibility of the President, starting where the Interstate Commerce Commission started 30 years ago, with his other unparalleled duties and authorities, being able to cope with the constantly recurring rate-making problems. It may be said that he will have the benefit of the advice of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but, unfortunately, the bill deprives him of that benefit because it expressly gives the commission appellate and supervisory power over the decisions of the President as to rates. Of course it is obvious that they can exercise no real supervisory power over the President, if assisting him, and at the same time serving him as agents, in the exercise of his rate-making authority.

The Interstate Commerce Commission consists of nine members. The term of one expires each year and in 1921 and 1922 the terms of two members of the commission expire. All of these vacancies are to be filled by the President. All except two of the members of the commission were appointed by the present occupant of the White House. Giving to the membership of this tribunal—which in the main throughout the greater part, at least, of the time since its establishment has rendered most valuable service—credit for the highest character and the greatest firmness, it is expecting too much of them, or any other set of men similarly placed, to ask that they shall override, however clear the case might be, the orders of their official creator in the fixing of rates. The committee substitute bill, in putting the initial rate-making authority in the hands of the President, thereby taking it out of the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and then providing for a review and supervision of his acts by men who are his official creatures in the sense that their official status is created by him, and expecting any real independence of judgment from such an appellate tribunal, is contrary to the experience of government and the science of legislation. It throws into confusion and uncertainty the entire rate-making machinery of the Government, which has been so painfully constructed.

It would have been far better if the bill had contained a simple, express provision reserving in the interstate and State commissions their existing rate-making authority, with the proviso that where necessary only, in the exercise of the duties imposed upon him by this act, the President might change rates so fixed. The mere spectacle itself, detached from its application, of the President of the United States being subject, in any of his actions, to the orders of subordinate executive or administrative officials appointed by him, is undignified and humiliating. Furthermore, in its application in this particular case, it is wholly unscientific and will be utterly ineffective.

This bill provides for the temporary use by the Government of railroads and the return to private control and operation 18 months after the "proclamation of peace terminating the war in which the United States is now engaged." The mere temporary taking over of roads and the temporary use of them by the Government, the measure of compensation for the two or three years of such use, or even the temporary method of rate control—questions which largely absorbed the debate upon this bill—are comparatively unimportant. A few years or months until the date fixed by this bill for the reestablishment of the old railroad policy will soon run by, and the country will easily have survived even the mistakes of legislation or of administration for that brief period. The one question of transcendent importance in the railroad problem is, What is to be the permanent disposition of the railroads—of their control, their rates, their service? Will we permanently persist in maintaining a system of private ownership, private control, private exploitation, in many instances, of the public highways of the Nation, through which the lifeblood of the people flows? Are we to continue the competition of rival private companies in the operation of these public arteries, with private gain and advantage as the first and primary consideration, and at a constant loss to the public of a part of the capacity of the roads? Or are the public roads to be operated as public roads, with the public interest as the primary consideration and private profit a secondary or incidental consideration? Shall the roads be coordinated and operated as one system, so as to secure the full and best use of each, both in handling the business of the communities where they are located and serving the Nation as a whole, as a part of one national system? Shall the enormous amount of cross hauling of commodities, the economic waste of unnecessary transportation, be curtailed and freight be routed to its ultimate destination by the shortest route? None of these matters are disposed of by this bill. Confessedly, by its express provision, its operation is temporary, to terminate on a certain day and hour in the near future, with no provision whatever made for the solution of these great, practical, public problems and policies.

In the broadest terms, opinion upon the proper policy of the Government toward the railroads may be divided into two classes: First, those who believe in private ownership and control and a continued rivalry and competition of private lines as they existed before the roads were taken over by the President; second, those who believe in complete Government control, with either private or Government ownership.

It is consistent for those who believe in continued private control to support the bill introduced in its present form.

By that I may say, in order not to put myself in the same attitude of indefiniteness I charged the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with being in, I am in favor of the bill that was first introduced, and am opposed to the changes which were made in it by the committee, and when I speak of the bill in its present form I am referring to the last one of the series of four separate bills, each with a separate individual number, which has marked the various evolutions of this piece of legislation, each one worse, I think, than the other.

It is consistent for those who believe in continued private control to support the bill introduced in its present form since by its terms it restores private control 18 months after the "proclamation of peace" and puts the burden of additional legislation upon the advocates of Government control. But those who believe in Government control and in the unification of the railroads of the Nation into one system, to be operated under strict Government supervision, with either private or public ownership, should support the original bill, as it was framed and introduced by the Director General and his legal advisers—in preference to the new committee substitute or committee amendment—whatever term may be given it. As it was first framed, the effect of the bill was that the roads should not be restored to private control without further legislation to that effect. I have talked with most of the members of the committee, with railroad men, with shippers and consumers, and for 20 years have been actively interested in practical and theoretical questions of railroad policy, and have been in contact with all shades of opinion upon that subject. I do not hesitate to say that the overwhelming consensus of judgment in this country is that our transportation system should not be returned to its former status. How many Senators are there here who will say that they are in favor of private, competitive operation and control as it existed heretofore?

I have an idea there are a few, but there are not many, I venture to say. The distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], in his learned discussion upon this subject, stated his position in these words:

> Mr. President, as to the second suggestion, I desire to say I do not believe that the railroads of this country will ever be permitted to return to the old competitive system which we have compelled them to pursue for the last 30 years. I do not believe they should be permitted to return to that system. I believe that they will be nationalized; that they will be operated as one transportation system; that they will not be compelled to compete; that they will be permitted to pool their traffic and their earnings; that useless lines will be abandoned; that all the property and all the equipment which every railroad has heretofore provided for its own operation and its own use will be used in common by all the other railroads in the nationalized system. I believe that the Government will control and finance this unit, and that private ownership will be continued in the future as in the past. In other words, complete Government control, with private ownership of the property controlled.

Furthermore, those who are in favor of pooling, whether under private control or under Government unification and control, will all agree that it is a question of colossal importance; and yet, like the Senator from Indiana, notwithstanding his positive and earnest declaration that he does not believe that the roads will ever be permitted to return to private control and the old competitive system, though recognizing the vital character of this question, propose, by this bill in its present form to do that very thing, namely, to restore the old system on a certain date. The able Senator from Indiana says:

> Why, then, should not the powers it—

Referring to the pending bill—> bestows cease at such specified time after the war? On what theory can it be definitely extended?

I presume that was a typographical error and means "indefinitely extended."

> Who is willing to contend that it is necessary in order to win this war to permit Mr. McAdoo, or any other man, to control the railroads long after the war?

And yet, in the same address, the learned Senator has stated that it is his belief that the Government will control and finance this unit—the unified and nationalized railroad system of the Nation—not only long after the war shall have ceased but permanently.

If Senators entertain these convictions, why should they vote for the committee changes in this bill, which provide for a return to a system which they believe to be wrong, trusting to some future Congress, perhaps, with possibly some future President, to undo, in the interest of the policy which they advocate, what by this committee bill they do?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator will permit me, I do not think he can find the inconsistency in my remarks that he might lead one to believe that he has found, or at least thinks he has found.

My contention is that this is a temporary measure, for war purposes only, and that at the conclusion of the holding or operation by the Government—that is to say, at the conclusion of the 18 months after the expiration of the war—these roads shall be turned back to private ownership, but that in the meantime we shall legislate in accordance with the other plan that I have suggested, or something along that line. I do not believe that the Government should continue to operate the railroads as they are now being operated; nor do I believe, on the other hand, that the railroads should be turned back to the old competitive system under private management; but I do believe that the railroads should be turned back to private ownership—that is to say, that private ownership should be continued, because the system of private ownership now obtains. I do believe, however, that between this and the time we turn the roads back we shall by appropriate legislation agree upon some system of governmental control that will obviate the necessity of Government ownership and yet will nationalize and unify the railroad systems of the country. So I do not see, with the permission of my friend, the inconsistency that he attributes to me in my remarks.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, Mr. President, I think I understand the Senator's position, and he advocated it very ably and very logically; but the fact still remains, and it is verified by the statement which the Senator has just made, that, in his opinion, private control should cease and that it should be supplanted by Government control before the roads are turned back to the private owners; but, notwithstanding that, he is supporting a measure providing just the contrary to that, to turn them back on a certain date, with no provision such as he advocates.

Now, he again says he thinks it ought to be done before that date, fixed in the bill for the termination of Government control, comes; but he is depending upon some future contingency, upon some future Congress, upon a future President perhaps, with all of the obvious and familiar difficulties of legislation, to accomplish a thing which he declines to do, though I suppose he regards as of the utmost importance.

Mr. WATSON. Now, Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all.

Mr. WATSON. Let me ask the Senator, would he now, in connection with this measure, which of necessity is temporary in its character, enter upon legislation to determine the whole future policy of this country with reference to the management, control, and operation of the railroads?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I would not; but I would not vote to return the railroads to the old private-owned competitive system until legislation had been enacted to remedy the existing evils, which, the Senator from Indiana admits, exist.

Mr. WATSON. Then the only difference between the Senator from Washington and myself is that he is apprehensive that the Congress that will be in existence at the close of the war, and for 18 months thereafter, may not perform its duty, whereas I have no such apprehension. In the speech which I made on the floor with reference to the question, I distinctly announced that the Congress then in existence would do its duty and would measure up to the requirements of the hour. That seems to be the difference between us.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hope that it will, Mr. President, do its duty. I have very little idea of what kind of a Congress we shall have at that time. I am familiar with the opportunity to blockade legislation even in good Congresses, and I prefer to act in the present, to preserve a status which is advantageous toward the accomplishment of the object which the Senator desires, rather than to surrender that advantage and console ourselves by a eulogy of a Congress that is not yet in being, and about which we know nothing whatever.

Mr. President, the final court, of course, before which this question is to be tried is public opinion; and before you restore the control of the railroads to private interests why not give the shippers, producers, and consumers of the land, for whom and by whom alone this public service is maintained, an opportunity at least to be heard at an election. If the public desires a return to private control, the owners of the railroads will unite with them to bring it about and there will be no legislative difficulty in the enactment of the law; but if, as is almost sure to be the case, the American people, like the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and a majority of the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, do not desire to return to the private rival lines, to the rate discriminations, to the power of life and death over industry in private systems, operated primarily for gain, then why prejudge the great question by the preference of this committee substitute bill over the bill that was originally introduced?

I will interrupt what I had intended to say here to answer a little more fully the question which the Senator from Indiana asked me a little while ago as to whether I would dispose of these questions now. On the contrary, in the midst of war the resources of Congress—the legislative resources—and all of the mental resources of the Members of Congress ought to be concentrated upon the conduct of the war; the resources of the country ought to be concentrated upon it; and there should be as little disturbance of existing systems, where such disturbance is not necessary or conducive to the successful conduct of the war, as possible. But for that very reason, because this is not an opportune time to dispose of these questions, and yet because they are questions that must be considered and ought to be disposed of, the present status, which gives an opportunity to consider them with advantage, ought to be preserved; and there could not be provisions put into this bill too rigid to prevent, whether 18 months after the war or at any other time, the return to a policy which Congress believes is wrong—at least, I assume that a majority believe it is wrong, and which the Senator from Indiana and myself agree should never be restored. I agree very largely with the Senator's substantive views about the matter. It seems to be largely a question of how to arrive at the object.

I am in entire accord with what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] said about the preservation of the foundation of credit in the country. I shall have later on a few remarks to make in connection with that subject, though I do not agree with his eulogy of monarchial forms of government. I prefer a republic. The Senator's statement that every bureau of the Government must necessarily be in a "petrified" condition in every form of government except in a monarchy is a praise of monarchy from an unexpected quarter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is Germany petrified?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think it is the most bureaucratic Government in the world.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, then the sooner we get petrified in the same way the sooner we shall lick Germany.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have not the same admiration for German kultur and the German Government that the Senator from Illinois seems to have. I have not the same admiration even for the boasted military ability of the German Government that the Senator seems to have, and that alleged German efficiency which seems to be such a fetich in certain circles. The subject of German superiority over the rest of the world is a little aside from this bill, but not any more aside from it than most of the things which the Senator from Illinois talked about in his speech. But even from a military standpoint Germany has failed. After preparing for this war with the most minute particularity, even down to the point of sewing two sets of suspender buttons on a soldier's pants, with secret plans, and the surprise of peaceful nations by violation of treaties, though outnumbering the French 8 to 5, Germany was defeated at the Marne, pinned to her trenches, and beaten in her object of occupying Paris in three months.

Even the boasted military prowess of the Germans is largely mythical.

But to return to the pending question—whether railroad control shall be retained until a permanent policy is adopted is largely a question of advantage of procedure. It is as though one should have enough confidence in his opinions and in the importance of accomplishing the great object in which he believes, to hold for those opinions and for the public interest of the country the advantage of the present status, rather than by surrendering it, put the burden upon the public of recovering it again.

Why should we, before we have acted upon these vital questions or even considered them, entrench the railroad corporations in the law and put the burden upon the people of changing that law against the obstructions of the entrenched interests? Of course, it is almost obnoxious nowadays to use the word "interests," but I use it in the most literal sense—the investment of private parties in these public utilities—and in no invidious sense at all.

The affirmative in legislation is always more difficult to maintain than the negative, just as the offensive is in warfare. If the German oppressors of Belgium and would-be conquerors of the world would get out of their holes in the ground, they would very soon be driven back behind the Rhine, where they belong; but they are pursuing a defensive warfare, and their opponents have the burden of the offensive. If we give the railroads, by the thirteenth section of the bill as amended by the committee, the first-line trench of the Senate, and the second-line trench of the House, and the third-line trench of the presidential veto, and the fourth-line trench of the courts, they may be depended upon to do enough camouflaging of issues, of gassing and bombing of opponents, of frightfulness and ruthlessness of business and political warfare, and of protracted discussion in the courts to make a long war and defer for many years the reestablishment of governmental control.

Neither is it likely that the great tribunal of the people, to which all of our actions here must be submitted, will decree in favor of a consolidation of the railroads of the country under private control, however much it might add to their efficiency. Such a monster of power in private hands could defy the Government, and its inevitable abuses would tempt revolution, which is already lifting its bloody hand in the world. Such a private power would set itself up above the courts and the people. Joined and meticulated together by the law, it would prove a very Frankenstein of irresponsible power and defy its creator.

The Senator from Illinois, if he will pardon me for referring to his speech again, has pointed out that even in the divided state of railroad power, it was able to force legislation through Congress. If we unite that power under private ownership, without the restraints of governmental control, the conditions which the Senator has described will be very much aggravated.

If it is agreed that private competition in transportation is wasteful and inefficient, and private monopoly is dangerous and oppressive, why is it proposed, in the little space of 18 months after the close of the war, to return to either one or the other? I say one or the other because, although supposed to be forbidden by the Sherman Antitrust Act, and so decreed by the Supreme Court of the United States, there was, until the roads were taken over by the Government, a steady tendency toward consolidation of private control. I might call attention here to the fact that I have seen appear before committees of the Senate a very courteous and able gentleman to speak for his client, which was a committee representing 97 per cent of all the railroads in the United States, and that concert of action was notwithstanding the Sherman antitrust law.

It may be admitted that this is an inopportune time for making these permanent readjustments, but the opportunity to make them, in so far as this law is concerned, should be preserved to the public, and the burden should be put upon the private interests involved to promote additional legislation if Government control is to be permanently divested. We should not surrender it by this act, and put the burden upon the public to secure additional legislation in order to recover it.

If I were opposed to Government control, Mr. President, I would promote in every way that I could the fixing of a definite time when it should end; but if I were in favor of it I should oppose legislation now or at any other time to bring it to an end.

The science of government teaches that laws should be so framed, as far as possible, as to make it to the interest of the governed to support the policies of the Government. This matter should be so arranged that the powerful private interests concerned would have the burden of positive and affirmative action in order to restore the old condition of almost unrestricted private control. It is always easier to delay, block, and defeat a bill than to enact one. If the bill passes in its present form the time will come when the passions of the people will be stirred by one of the most stupendous political conflicts in their history, with private interests entrenched in the statute and the public interest at the disadvantage of overcoming every obstruction and delay to which our form of government, with its intricate system of checks and balances, gives so many opportunities, with its bicameral legislature, its executive and judicial vetoes, its pigeonholes, its filibusters, its struggles in committees of the Senate, of the House, and of conference, with a legislative executioner at every door to demand the password.

If now, confessedly without consideration of the intricate questions involved, we provide that at a certain date the railroads shall be restored to the prewar private control, then we establish the private railroad interests in every one of these strategic points. The public interest should be established in them. The private interests would then be compelled to unite with the Government in securing the enactment of a law fixing a permanent basis of transportation.

The legitimate interests of every investor under the law should be protected, and liberality rather than parsimony should govern their compensation. The Government and the people can afford to be liberal, they can always afford to be liberal, but they can especially afford to be liberal in this matter, because the costs of the transaction are small compared to the immense and permanent benefits to be derived from the correct settlement of the question.

To illustrate just by one instance, Boise, Idaho, in the midst of the sheep country, is 700 miles nearer to the wool market in Boston than Portland, Oreg.; yet under the old private operation of roads the freight rate on wool from the wool country, Boise, to the wool market in Boston was $1.98 per hundred, while the rate from Portland, 700 miles farther away, was $1. The rate on wool from Boise to Portland was 77 cents, so that it costs $1.77 to ship wool from Boise to Portland, and back from Portland, through Boise, and on to Boston; while it costs $1.98 to ship direct from Boise to Boston, 1,400 miles less of transportation. The amount that would be saved to the people of vast regions in the United States by the removal of unjust and inequitable discriminations of this kind would far more than compensate the Nation in increased production and prosperity and in release from unjust burdens of rate taxation for any cost which, whether temporarily or permanently, the Government would be put to in taking over the control of the roads.

I was once a member of a subcommittee investigating certain charges that the development of coal mines tributary to the Southern Railway system was suppressed by those who controlled its finances in the interest of northern roads in which they were concerned. The testimony indicated that rich coal fields within easy reach of southern ports by way of the Southern Road were prevented from being developed by discriminatory rates. The removal of motives and opportunities for such manipulation of development by the private control of transportation—which really is a public function and agency of the Government itself—which would be accomplished, will be another compensation, with the long list of others, which far more than overbalance even the most liberal measure of satisfaction of any private claims in these highways.

The Erie Canal is a natural regulator and reducer of freight rates on all transportation between the Atlantic coast and the great West, from the North Carolina line to the Canadian border.

I have that statement, which fastened itself in my mind, from one of the most important representatives of the railroads in the country, and it undoubtedly is a basic truth. Under the system reestablished by this committee bill, the power of the vast investments in railroad transportation has attacked and destroyed hundreds of water transportation systems, which, if preserved, would have had effects similar to that of the Erie Canal. Under public control all motives for opposition to supplementary water transportation will be removed and, on the other hand, by the union of these two arms of traffic the efficiency of both will be increased and the prosperity of the Nation multiplied.

To some the financing of either Government control or Government ownership of railroads appears to be an insuperable obstacle. The Government ownership is not a necessary accompaniment of Government control, and to some it is undesirable; but, with or without Government ownership, the Government financing of Government control could be effected without difficulty or embarrassment, and the savings alone which would result from the economies incident to the consolidation of various conflicting systems, by a system of amortization and gradual reduction of financial obligations, even though the burden of Government ownership were assumed, would go far toward extinguishing the debt in 50 years.

Neither has consideration been given by this bill or in the framing of it to methods, means, and organization of Government control. These details offer no insuperable obstacle. The appointment of assistant directors for various consolidated transportation systems, composed of what heretofore have been rival and competing lines, with jurisdiction coordinate with certain sections of the system, acting under the authority of the Director General—subject to the control of Congress, and with the assistance of the established commissions—could very readily be perfected into a satisfactory organization. These questions, however, are open for discussion and adjustment. It is not pretended in this bill even to consider them, and the opportunity for their consideration will be very much compromised by the preference of the committee bill.

Now, who is in favor of the old system, other than the private owners of the railroads? A few pseudoconservatives. By pseudoconservatives I mean those who by their natural constitutions are opposed to change of any existing institution. It is a false conservatism, because it is an impossible attitude. For many it would be a very comfortable position if it could be maintained. But it is futile to resist change. Evolution is a law of human society as truly as of the rest of nature, and obstruction of its course leads either to decay or violence. The law of the survival of the fittest, in the struggles of men and nations, applies to policies of transportation as it does to every other essential activity of organized society.

In our complicated modern state the lives of the people, in a direct and literal sense, depend upon railway transportation. Its mismanagement or perversion for selfish private interests is instantaneously reflected in the economic life of the people.

It is going far to say that a factor so vital to the welfare and existence of the Nation shall by this bill, at a fixed time, be restored to private control, without even an attempt at settlement of the mighty issues involved.

Mr. STERLING. I send to the desk a proposed amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is out of order.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate take a recess, then.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; that motion is out of order. There is a unanimous-consent agreement that on the legislative day of Thursday, February 21, 1918, the Senate will proceed to consider this bill in a certain way. There can be no legislative day of February 21 if a recess is taken.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, that is all I rose for—to remind the Senator that that is the situation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move, then, that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 21, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 20, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Rule Thou, Almighty King, over the spirit and affairs of our land. Add Thy favor to all our undertakings, both civil and military. Govern with the conquering power of Thy will the aims and work of the President and his advisers, the Congress of the United States, and all our Army and Navy authorities. May God reign that the country may live.

Be with the officers, Members, and servants of this House individually. Teach them to live as though each day were to be their last before the night cometh when no man can work, and yet as though each day were the beginning of an endless chain of causation, with every linked effect in which each must reckon.

And when at last they reach the vale of Jordan, through the merits of the atoning Savior, land them as ransomed souls safe on Canaan's sid

And the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with us all evermore. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6361) to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war, had agreed to the conference asked for by the House, and had appointed Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. NELSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. FRANCE and Mr. HOLLIS members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Interior Department.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WALSH rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. I rise to make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, pending that, may I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks?

The SPEAKER. You can not turn a wheel until you get a quorum. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 342 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a motion.

The SPEAKER. You can not make a motion until you get rid of this.

Mr. DOWELL. All right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. DOWELL. I desire to make a motion. I move that we dispense with Calendar Wednesday to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that we dispense with the business usually transacted on Calendar Wednesday to-day.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we have under consideration the railroad bill, which is not only important to both branches of Congress, but to the entire country, it would seem to me we ought to proceed as rapidly as possible to the consideration of that bill, and it is for this reason that I make the motion. I believe it should be concurred in by all Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa reserves four minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the motion will not prevail. The chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has made no such request. It was understood by him and by the members of the committee that no such motion would be made. It is well known that that motion is not made to take up the railroad bill, but in order to defeat the Buchanan statue measure, which was before the House last Wednesday. This bill, as I understand, if it is to become available at all, must be passed by March 1.

Mr. SLAYDEN. By July.

Mr. KITCHIN. I believe that the gentlemen who have charge of the Buchanan statue bill ought to have their day in court. Their day will be lost if it is dispensed with to-day, and they will get no more days until they get around the calendar again, and that will not be done again at this session.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not a fact that the Director General of Railroads has sent a letter to Members of both branches, urging the passage of the railway legislation without any delay whatever?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and this is not delaying it. Of course, that meant under the rules of the House and the general course of procedure here, and they knew that you could not bring in a rule to dispense with Calendar Wednesday for the purpose of considering the railroad bill. Calendar Wednesday must be dispensed with either by a two-thirds vote or by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOWELL. In reply to the gentleman from North Carolina I desire to say that there are many Members of the House who desire to discuss the railroad bill. Under the rules they are not able to secure the time they desire in which to discuss this measure. If Calendar Wednesday is dispensed with every opportunity can be given for those who desire to present their views upon this question and to give it careful consideration, and it does seem to me that it is not proper to dispense with the consideration of the railroad bill in order to take up other matters at this time. I know the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has frequently come to the House with the request that Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with in order that important legislation might be considered. He has always received not only a majority, but usually unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with for that purpose. I know of no more important legislation than that which is now pending before the House, and it should have immediate consideration. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I believe I am entitled to the three minutes remaining of the five.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] that if he had been less eager to filibuster and try to defeat this bill than he is to advance the consideration of the railroad bill we would have been through with it in half the time he has consumed. Last Wednesday, as almost every Member of this House knows, we discussed this bill and advanced it to the stage where, after having concluded general debate, we might have had a vote on it; but some gentlemen suggested to me that it would be at least courteous and considerate of their feelings if a vote were not pressed, because some of them had an engagement to go to the White House. I believed then, and I believe the House knows, that we had votes enough on the floor at that time to have passed the bill, but out of consideration for the 15 gentlemen we did not press it.

One of the very eminent Members on that side of the House who voted against the consideration of this bill assured me that so far as he knew there would be no more filibustering against it. I know he would not have deceived me, and so he must have been mistaken or his followers are out of hand.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to have a vote on the measure at once, and the vote that the gentleman is demanding on his motion to postpone could be used to either pass or defeat the bill.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, for printing in the RECORD, a table that is a brief history of monuments heretofore erected in Washington by permission of the Congress. Nineteen of them were paid for out of the Public Treasury. Fifteen were provided by the joint contribution of citizens, or associations of citizens, and from the public moneys, while nine were provided for by citizens only.

Of the 15 that were paid for by joint public and private contributions some are memorials to very distinguished characters. Among them are Garfield, Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln, John Witherspoon, Gen. W. T. Sherman, George Washington, and Frederick the Great. The last was given by the Emperor of Germany, and the pedestal paid for by appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States.

Among the nine memorials paid for wholly by private citizens we find represented the names of the following great men: Lincoln, Albert Pike, Kosciusko, Benjamin Franklin, and Dr. Samuel Gross.

Mr. Speaker, I have a little time remaining, and I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in regard to the alien conscription bill reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the alien-slacker bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has not the gentleman already obtained permission for that?

Mr. MASON. I thought I had, but I am not sure, and I wish to be sure, and it does not take any time to give this consent now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas objects. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] to dispense with Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. DOWELL. On which I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of dispensing with Calendar Wednesday will, when their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 228, answered "present" 2, not voting 80, as follows:

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. TREADWAY. I voted "no." I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri, and would like to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

The Clerk called the name of Mr. TREADWAY, and he answered "Present," as above recorded.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Pennsylvania, for the balance of the week, on account of illness; and

To Mr. STEDMAN, for one week, on account of death in the family.

STATUE OF JAMES BUCHANAN.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. I rise to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that that motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. No; a Member has the right to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is palpably dilatory.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the gentleman is correct. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business of the House is House joint resolution 70, "Authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of James Buchanan, a former President of the United States," and the gentleman from Massachusetts raises the question of consideration.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Walsh) there were 136 ayes and 52 noes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum voted on this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order because the roll call just demonstrated that a quorum is present.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands the yeas and nays.

The question was taken, and 32 Members rose in favor thereof.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the other side.

The other side was taken, and 142 Members rose.

The SPEAKER. The ayes are 38 and the noes 142—not a sufficient number; and the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] will take the chair temporarily until the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] appears.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SHERLEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution by title.

The Clerk reported the title of the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate having been concluded, the Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant permission to the trustees designated in the will of Mrs. Harriet Lane Johnston for the erection of a memorial to James Buchanan, a former President of the United States, on public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington, D. C., in the southern portion of Meridian Hill Park, between Fifteenth, Sixteenth, W, and Euclid Streets NW.: Provided, That the design and location of said memorial and the plan for the treatment of the grounds connected with its site shall be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of said memorial.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] was so exceedingly anxious that no time be consumed in the consideration of this resolution, and being supported in his anxiety to get through to-day's work so that we might go to the consideration of the railroad bill, I desire to say that, if it is agreeable here, I am willing to take a vote now upon this measure. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Would that facilitate the taking up of the railroad bill at all?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, yes; I fancy it would, just as much as it would have facilitated it an hour ago when the gentleman began to filibuster.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, no. If we had dispensed with business in order on Calendar Wednesday, then we could have taken that up.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have ever known so experienced and clever a man as the gentleman from Massachusetts to discuss a dead and gone issue. Calendar Wednesday has not been dispensed with.

Mr. GILLETT. To finish this bill would simply be to bring up another bill that is in order on Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. We could not take up the railroad bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the resolution to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential motion that I desire to offer.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Because the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is in the way, and we all know what a help he is to hasty legislation. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Wisconsin desires to offer a preferential motion.

Mr. STAFFORD. I desire recognition to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that the committee do now rise and report the resolution with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential motion that I desire to offer. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I move the previous question on my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not move the previous question in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I demand recognition to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will submit his amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, what has become of the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN]?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin claims to have a preferential motion, and the Chair is trying to determine whether it is preferential.

Mr. BUTLER. I merely wanted to suggest to the Chair that the motion to rise is a preferential motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not tell until he knows what the gentleman from Wisconsin is offering. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the words "United States," strike out all of the remainder of the paragraph down to the proviso and insert "on one of the public reservations generally known as small-park areas, and which is entirely surrounded by streets in the city of Washington, D. C., to be selected by the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds and the Commission of Fine Arts."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule, but will hear the gentleman from Wisconsin, if he desires to be heard, as to his motion being a preferential motion.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have not at my finger's end the authorities, but I am quite certain that there are any number of precedents which hold that a motion that the committee do now rise and report a bill is not in order as long as any Member is claiming recognition to offer an amendment to perfect the bill that is being considered in Committee of the Whole. That has been the invariable rule for years in Committee of the Whole. I have never known it to be invaded at any time. Whenever a bill is being considered for amendment in Committee of the Whole a motion to rise and report the bill is not in order when Members are claiming recognition to offer an amendment. This is not a mere pro forma amendment, but is an amendment to the resolution that is in order, and accordingly I ask recognition for that purpose.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If that contention is well taken, how would you ever get out of Committee of the Whole, as long as there was some one who wanted to offer a motion to amend?

Mr. STAFFORD. Whenever a legitimate motion is made to amend the bill the person offering it is entitled to recognition. The rules of the House are predicated upon the idea that when a bill is referred to Committee of the Whole any germane amendment may be offered to the bill, and opportunity must be given to Members to offer that amendment. This amendment is germane, and I ask recognition on that ground.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Every amendment that is in order from the parliamentary point of view is a legitimate amendment, so as long as you offered an amendment to a bill that was in order you could never get out of Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I certainly understood that the Chair had already recognized the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas can not take the gentleman from Pennsylvania off his feet to make a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is in order.

Mr. LITTLE. I did not notice that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was on his feet. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I guess I am not very large, but I am willing to wait until the gentleman from Kansas gets through. I understood that the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Texas to move that the committee should rise before the gentleman from Wisconsin had recognition to amend the resolution. If that is so, all the other amounts to nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. LITTLE. My inquiry was whether this bill has been read or not.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been read.

Mr. LITTLE. It has been read in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Chair is ready to rule. There is one fundamental rule that underlies nearly all parliamentary law, and that is that the committee should have the right to dispose of matters most expeditiously. The committee is denied no right by giving preference to the motion of the gentleman from Texas, because if the committee desires to amend the bill rather than report it in its present form, it can do that by denying the motion of the gentleman from Texas. The Chair holds that the motion of the gentleman from Texas is in order, and puts the question.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers [Mr. SLAYDEN and Mr. STAFFORD] reported that there were—ayes 132, noes 43.

So the motion to rise was agreed to.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRIEST. Is it in order to ask for permission to extend remarks at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks upon this resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, as debate has been shut off I ask permission to extend my remarks on this same resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks upon this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that privilege for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], who is not present and who desires to extend his remarks.

Mr. WALSH. I object to that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks on this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. I thought the gentleman from Texas asked for general permission to extend remarks.

Mr. SLAYDEN. No; I asked for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD].

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. SHERLEY] reported that the committee having had under consideration House joint resolution 70, had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes had it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 143, noes 44.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirteen Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. There are six vacancies in the House, do they count——

The SPEAKER. But there are only 213 Members here, and you could not count a quorum if you counted the whole crowd that is missing or out. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 217, nays, 119, answered "present" 4, not voting 88, as follows:

Until further notice:

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania with Mr. HAMILTON of New York.

Mr. PHELAN with Mr. WARD.

Mr. RAINEY with Mr. KAHN.

Mr. EAGLE with Mr. SCOTT of Iowa.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "nay." I desire to withdraw the vote and answer "present," as I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER].

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The Clerk will read the resolution the third time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed resolution.

The SPEAKER. The engrossed resolution is not here.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes touching the ruling made by me in the chair a few minutes ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes on a ruling which he made. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire what effect the granting of this unanimous consent would have upon the status of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It has none whatever. There is no engrossed copy of the bill here, and you can not vote on it unless there is.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I wish to make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not make a motion to recommit until we have a third reading of the bill.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I feel that I should make a statement to the House in view of the ruling I made as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] made a motion upon the reading of the joint resolution, which was a resolution of one paragraph, that the committee rise and report the bill with a favorable recommendation. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] offered what he claimed was a preferential motion, namely, a motion to amend. The Chair asked the gentleman from Wisconsin for authority, and he stated that he was sure of his position, but at the moment was unable to cite the Chair to an authority. The parliamentary clerk at the desk confirmed an impression that the Chair had that a motion to rise and report the bill favorably, under the circumstances stated, was a motion in order as against a subsequent motion to amend, and the Chair so held.

Immediately after coming out of the chair I took occasion to examine the precedents, and I find that there are any number of precedents holding directly to the contrary. The Chair was wrong in his ruling. There is a decision by no less a Speaker than Speaker Carlisle, and a number of decisions by Chairmen of Committees of the Whole, holding that a motion to amend is a preferential motion. There is no rule now that directly bears upon it, although there was an old rule; but it is held that inasmuch as the committee is created for the purpose of considering a bill for amendment that the opportunity to offer such amendment should be given. What misled me in making my ruling was the belief that a committee ought to have the right to dispose of a matter in the most expeditious way, and that, if it did not desire to amend, it could show that by voting a motion to rise and report favorably. If it did want to amend, it could simply vote down such a motion. I stated as Chairman of the committee the reason for such ruling. The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] had been read, so that the Committee of the Whole was thoroughly advised as to the issue, and did, in point of fact, by its vote express an opinion. But I felt, in view of the ruling that has been made, that I owed it to the House to make a statement as to my error.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can see the unworkable position the House would be put into if the ruling made by the gentleman should be adhered to. In the case of bills in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having more than one paragraph or section, it would be the privilege of Members to offer an amendment to every section except the last, and then the committee having the bill in charge would be privileged to move to rise and report the bill and not give opportunity to the House to offer an amendment to the last section.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not quite agree with the gentleman's reasoning, but the precedents are all against me, and I wanted to tell the House so. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. Did the gentleman in his researches discover any method by which such error could be corrected?

Mr. SHERLEY. There are always remedies by which errors can be corrected if the House desires to do so.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman tell me how we can remedy this proposition?

Mr. SHERLEY. The House, if it desired to do so, could by unanimous consent vacate an order or it could do so on a motion to reconsider. It is only fair to state, as I have already said, that the ruling did not, in my judgment, prejudice anyone, because the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin was read to the committee, and the Chair expressly stated that if they wanted to consider that amendment they could simply vote down the other motion. So the committee expressed its view just as clearly as if the Chair had ruled right.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman suggests unanimous consent as the only remedy. I ask unanimous consent to return to the place in the bill which we had before the ruling was made.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is that the Clerk will report the next bill from the Committee on the Library.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In respect to this bill for which demand was made for an engrossed copy, when will we vote on that?

The SPEAKER. We will vote on it to-morrow morning.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The first thing to-morrow morning, after the other business is disposed of?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry in connection with the reply of the Speaker to the inquiry propounded by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS]. Do I understand the Speaker to hold that if the House should adjourn to-day before the engrossed copy of the resolution is received by the Clerk the vote would come on the resolution to-morrow morning as a matter of course, and that a motion to recommit, or any other motion which would be in order, would be deferred until that time?

The SPEAKER. You can not make a motion to recommit until after the third reading, and you can not have the third reading unless you can get the engrossed copy of the resolution. Two Speakers of the House, at least—Speaker CANNON and myself—have decided heretofore that when the previous question is ordered on a bill on Calendar Wednesday the vote shall be taken Thursday morning. I think Speaker CANNON never decided it but once, and everybody took it for granted that he was right, and I have decided it two or three times for some reason or other.

Mr. WALSH. But, Mr. Speaker, the previous question now has only been ordered on the third reading.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered on the resolution and everything else.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. And the resolution is now up to the point of passage.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to make one remark that ought to be made. If they get that engrossed copy of the resolution in here this evening and everybody wants to vote on it, it can be voted on to-day. If they do not get it in here to-day, it will be voted on to-morrow.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the engrossed copy of the resolution should be brought in here at any time before adjournment, I can ask that it be voted on then?

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what the Chair stated. When the engrossed copy is ready, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] to make the motion to recommit.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I take it for granted that the Chair, in announcing what the decision would be, meant it will still be subject to a point of order and that the point of order can be argued to the Chair when the time arrives?

The SPEAKER. Yes; of course. I am always willing to hear argument.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD—about what?

Mr. HARDY. This resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I submit a request for unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this resolution by printing a table which I have had compiled in response to questions asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] the other day. It is a table which I think will be interesting.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on this resolution that we just had up. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this resolution.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. DEWALT. And I make the same request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. One gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WATSON] and two gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE and Mr. DEWALT] ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MASON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the alien-slacker bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the alien-slacker bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SHOUSE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas objects.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] any business from his committee?

Mr. SLAYDEN. There are two other bills on the calendar, but I am told by the Clerk that they have not been there long enough to be called up.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the list of committees.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees.

LONGEVITY PAY, ARMY AND NAVY OFFICERS.

Mr. WEBB (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 1691, known as the bill to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear and try certain longevity claims.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1691) to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] in the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1691) to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1691, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Court of Claims shall have power to enter judgment upon the findings of fact heretofore made in claims of officers of the United States Army for longevity pay under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States v. Morton, volume 112, United States Reports, page 1; and United States v. Watson, volume 130, United States Reports, page 80; and of the Court of Claims in Stewart v. United States, volume 34, Court of Claims Reports, page 553.

And that the accounting officers of the Treasury in the settlement of claims for longevity pay and allowances on account of services of officers in the Regular Army arising under section 15 of an act approved July 5, 1838, entitled "An act to increase the present Military Establishment of the United States, and for other purposes," and subsequent acts affecting longevity pay and allowances, shall credit as service in the Army of the United States, within the meaning of said acts, all services rendered as a cadet at the United States Military Academy and as an enlisted man or commissioned officer in the Regular and Volunteer Armies, in all cases in which heretofore this credit was disallowed by any such accounting officer of the Treasury, and no decision of a comptroller heretofore made against a claimant under said section 15 shall preclude a settlement under the terms of this act where the claim has not been paid.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction over claims of certain officers for longevity pay, which claims were denied by the Comptroller of the Treasury in the years between 1890 and 1908. All longevity claims for pay prior to that time have been paid. All longevity claims for pay after 1908 have been paid. The Supreme Court has ruled that they ought to be paid; that the attendance of those officers at the Military and Naval Academies was part of their service and, as part of their service, they are entitled to be paid for same. Under the rulings of the comptroller for the period between 1890 and 1908 those claims have been denied entirely, and the purpose of this bill is to allow officers whose claims were denied during 1890 to 1908 to file their claims and receive their pay under the law as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the members of the committee to this bill for two reasons—first, because of its own importance, and, second, for a reason that is perhaps personal in large degree to myself.

One of the first bills that it was my privilege to speak for and advocate in this House was a bill offered in the Congress in 1914, which appealed to my sentiment and spirit of patriotism when I discovered it in our Judiciary Committee unacted upon. It was a bill to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes. By virtue of that section, passed immediately at the close of the Civil War, the soldiers of the Confederacy who had been soldiers or commissioned officers of the United States prior to the Civil War were expressly debarred from presenting their longevity claims and having the same paid. At that time, as you may recall, there was extant in our country a spirit of harmony and a desire for a greater unity. Grand Army posts in the North were surrendering flags to Confederate posts in the South, and likewise in the South recognitions of courtesy were extended to posts in the North. The reunion on the battle field of Gettysburg had taken place, where old veterans who had stood in battle array against one another met and greeted and rejoiced in a restored union. The dedication of the Arlington monument had just taken place. I made an appeal to this House for the passage of that bill, which repealed the law that debarred relatives of Lee, Jackson, and other great men who had figured in the Confederate Army from getting the pay that was due under the laws of the United States prior to the beginning of that war. I am happy to say that on that occasion—some of you may recall it—the repeal of that section of the Revised Statutes was unanimously approved by this House.

But I discovered that in the administration of the law with reference to longevity claims there was a period, as the chairman of our committee has explained, from 1890 to 1908, in which the claims of those men who had served in the Union Army had either been presented and rejected, or certainly none of them had been passed, creating a situation of inequality and injustice that, in my opinion, ought to be remedied. This difficulty arose out of a difference of opinion of certain auditors. The Supreme Court of the United States having decided that this claim for extra compensation covered the period of service in the academy, one of the comptrollers made up his mind that he would disregard the decision of the Supreme Court, and he refused for a long period to permit any of these claims to be presented and paid. Another comptroller came in, and he said that the opinion of the Supreme Court was binding upon him, and that he would recognize these claims, but, mark you, with this distinction, that all the claims that had been presented either to the Court of Claims or to the previous comptroller would not be considered by him, because, as he said, they were res judicata, they had been determined, they were settled, and thus this injustice was wrought to the men who had been alert to prove their claims but had been met by the stubborn opposition of the comptroller who was then in power.

Since then I have, with the greatest possible earnestness, attempted to have passed through our committee and by this House a bill to remedy this egregious wrong and give to those Union soldiers what we agreed by the repeal of that statute to give to the men who had gone into the Confederate service; in other words, to relieve these Union soldiers from the bar which had been unrighteously put up against them, and have their claims paid just the same as the claims of Grant and of Lee and the others, whose claims have been presented and honored and settled, amounting on the Union side to about $1,000,000 and on the Confederate side, I think, to about $150,000. There are still outstanding and unpaid claims which are righteously due to these generals and soldiers and officers of about $500,000, and there is nothing that this Nation can do that will be such an act of justice as to order and direct that these men or their descendants shall now have equity and proper treatment, even at this late day.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that this will cost the Government only approximately a half million dollars?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I do. That is the report.

Mr. WALSH. And that this is to be paid only to those officers and soldiers who are living?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; it goes to their heirs, the same as the others did. In the other case I received letters from Mrs. "Stonewall" Jackson and a number of the other women of the South whose claims were honored and paid. They were the relatives of the deceased soldiers. So in this case the relatives of the deceased soldiers who have thus been barred out will be honored and recognized, and I earnestly ask this committee to pass upon and approve this bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman has any further time, I would like to ask him to explain a little bit more in detail just where the hardship comes in from which these people suffer. I do not just get it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. In the report of the committee which I made on the bill that was up in the last Congress, and which through the crush of business failed to pass at that time, I appended a list of all the Union officers who were paid and a list of all the officers who were in the Confederate service who have been paid. Now, those men have been paid. These others are equally entitled to be paid, but owing to certain circumstances their claims were debarred. Now let me give you briefly a résumé of the circumstances.

First, by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States officers in the United States Army were allowed credit, in computing their longevity pay, for services as cadets at the Military Academy. That is the basis of all these claims.

Owing to the fact that the Court of Claims had jurisdiction only of cases where the right of action had arisen within six years from the time of bringing the suit, that court was closed so far as having jurisdiction to render relief. That avenue was not open to these people who wanted to collect their longevity pay under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, because of the statute of limitations; but the jurisdiction of the accounting officers in the Treasury was not barred by the statute of limitations. Everyone had a right to present his claim there. Now, the men who were vigilant, who did not sleep upon their rights, presented their claims to the accounting officer in the Treasury; but that gentleman, a man from my own State, I am sorry to say, ruled that he would not follow the decision of the Supreme Court, and for a long time he refused to recognize any of those claims. Another comptroller comes in and says, "I am bound by the decision of the United States Supreme Court, and I will recognize these claims," and the claims were presented to him, passed, and paid, all except those which had been presented to the prior comptroller, who said they were barred because they were res judicata. For that reason they were barred out. The new comptroller would not review the decision of his predecessor.

Now, if all of the others had a right to be paid, and if all the others were paid, then surely the obstinacy of this controlling officer ought not to keep these people whom he barred out from getting their pay.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman will pardon me, as I understand it, the longevity pay is fixed by law in the Army, and the fact that a man did not make application does not seem to me would affect his rights at all.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It does not.

Mr. McKENZIE. Did this comptroller, in rendering this decision, overstep the law of the land, or did he construe the law on the statute books which you are now trying to repeal?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I am not trying to repeal anything.

Mr. McKENZIE. Well, to extend the law.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; I am providing for the payment of claims unjustly barred out.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is trying to remedy a case where the vigilance of the claimant counted against him.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; instead of in his favor. There was a dispute, a debatable ground, as to whether the period that a man served in the Military Academy was to be counted as service to the United States in computing longevity pay. We all recognize that the highest tribunal to settle that question is the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case of Morton against the United States the Court of Claims held that the term "actual time of service in the Army" as used in the act of 1881 covered time spent as a cadet at the Military Academy.

This was appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed this decision on October 27, 1884 (United States v. Morton, 112 U. S., 1). The Supreme Court said:

"From this review of the statutes it can not be doubted that before the passage of the act of July 28, 1866, as well as afterwards, the Corps of Cadets of the Military Academy was a part of the Army of the United States, and a person serving as a cadet was serving in the Army, and that the time during which the plaintiff in the present case was serving as a cadet was actual time of service by him in the Army."

When that decision was rendered, then came the effort to collect the longevity pay, but they were met by Comptroller Gilkeson, who said, "I will not audit any of these claims," and that stood under him and his successors from 1890 to 1908. That was the attitude.

Now, the new comptroller comes in and he permits all the claims presented to him to be passed and paid, except those which were presented to Mr. Gilkeson and his successors between 1890 and 1908, and which he said he would not hear or consider, because they had been adjudicated against these people. The iniquity and unrighteousness of that decision must be apparent to any one of us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania five minutes more.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. The legislation in this bill will affect chiefly those who have served in the United States Military Academy. There are a few cases outside.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I know of none outside those passing through the Military Academy.

Mr. NORTON. It does not affect the case of Union soldiers, because they have been provided for.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It affects Union soldiers and no others. They were the only ones that could offer a claim under Mr. Gilkeson. The statute of 1866, which forbade the comptroller to consider any Confederate claim, was a bar to their claims being considered, but in 1914, as I recall, the House of Representatives passed a bill, in which the Senate concurred, repealing that section of the Revised Statutes which stood in the way of a Confederate officer being paid. They have been paid, and the only ones left out are the victims of that unfortunate decision of the comptroller in this period between 1890 and 1908.

Mr. FIELDS. In other words, if the claims filed with Mr. Gilkeson had been deferred until the administration of his successor, they would have been paid?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Exactly.

Mr. FIELDS. And there would have been no necessity for any legislation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is true.

Mr. FIELDS. Similar claims filed under his successor were recognized and paid.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; Comptroller Butler afterwards allowed the claims brought before him, passed upon them, and paid them, and among those that were paid were those of Grant, Rosecrans, and Kilpatrick.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The function of the Court of Claims is to make a finding of facts and report to Congress. It has no function in this class of cases to enter judgment, but the purpose of this bill is to enable the Court of Claims to enter judgment. Heretofore the Court of Claims has reported on findings of fact, and we have had an opportunity to act on the report adversely.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there has been any adverse action on these claims, except by the comptroller?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman's report shows that this is the twenty-first time that this has been before Congress.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. But not one instance when it was adversely reported on.

Mr. BORLAND. It has been stricken out of the general claims bill three times since I have been a Member of Congress.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I can not say about that, but when there has been a specific consideration of it it has never been reported against. I can not understand the mental operation or the attitude of anyone who would hesitate to vote for the payment of the claims of these Union soldiers—claims to which they are entitled.

Mr. BORLAND. It is not a question of the Union soldier, it applies to the graduate of West Point, and he may be a Union soldier or may not. It does not apply to Union soldiers, a great many of whom are volunteers.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I want to correct the gentleman's misapprehension of the fact. The men who graduated from the Military Academy at West Point are the people who are affected by the decision of the Supreme Court. Some of them drifted into the Confederacy. Then came the bar of the statute forbidding them to be paid, because of their relations to the Confederacy. I came in here with a bill, and brought it to the attention of the House, using every energy in my power to lift that bar in the interest of that union between the North and the South that my friend, sitting in front of me, ex-Speaker CANNON so beautifully referred to the other day. This House unanimously agreed to remove that bar, and now I find that through the action of the comptroller a certain number of men have not been paid who are entitled to be paid, and I am bending every energy that I have to correct an act of injustice and to make equal the claims between men, whether they went into the Confederacy or into the Union Army. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman inform the House of the reason why this comptroller took that position, whether it was purely arbitrary on his part or did he have any precedent?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. He had no precedent. It was a purely arbitrary action.

Mr. ROBBINS. How many comptrollers followed the ruling of Comptroller Gilkeson? He was not the comptroller during all of that time, was he?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I can not answer that question. I can simply say that down until the time that Comptroller Butler came into office that was the ruling.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Mitchell seems to have been the first one.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; the first was Mr. Gilkeson.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be given three minutes more.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBBINS. What proportion of soldiers North and South that graduated at West Point will be recompensed under this bill?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Under this bill no one except those who were in the Union Army. The other bill covers those who had gone into the Confederacy, and they have all presented their claims and have been paid. This covers the unfortunate men whose claims were presented when this ruling of the comptroller was in force, and they were barred out by it, and when the next comptroller came in and recognized these claims he said that he would not go behind this date; that those others he considered adjudicated and therefore barred out. He would not take them up.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman has constantly referred to the Union officers who are affected. Do I understand that only Federal officers in the United States Army who served in the Civil War on the Federal side are affected by this legislation?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. They are the only ones that are now affected. Those who served in the Confederate Army have been relieved by the other legislation.

Mr. KEATING. Do I understand the gentleman to say that no man who did not serve in the Union Army during the Civil War will benefit from this legislation?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is my understanding of the facts of this case.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some of these officers could not have been in the Union Army, since their graduation dates back to 1811 and 1812. I was wondering what bearing that would have upon the gentleman's statement.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. There are no claims that date back that far that I know of.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The third claim on page 6—that of John J. Abert—is of a man who graduated from the Military Academy in 1811. I find quite a number throughout the list. They could not have served in the Union Army.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Why not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Because they were probably dead.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. From 1842 to 1861?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Here is a man who graduated in 1811. He certainly could not have fought in the Union Army?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. He may have been in the Army at that time or on the retired list. However, he was entitled to his longevity pay, and he got it. The list you are reading from is the list of paid claims.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman was drawing a distinction as between the Union and the Confederate Armies, and I think properly so; but it was pertinent to ask how that would apply to an officer of the United States graduated from West Point in 1811 or 1812.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I refer to that solely by way of explaining my own personal interest in this bill, and that, having been instrumental in removing the bar against those who went into the Confederate Army, I felt it was my duty to take an active part in trying to prevent a wrong which prevents other graduates entitled to longevity pay from being paid.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. I think the gentleman in his answer to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] probably gave a wrong impression to some, who feel that this legislation is for the benefit of Union soldiers only. As I understand it, the legislation does not confine itself to Union soldiers alone; but the only ones who happen to be in this unfortunate condition at this time were Union soldiers.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is right.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes, if I have any further time.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman has gone into this thing very carefully. Is he prepared to say now, in his judgment as a lawyer, that the comptroller who ruled against these claims, ruled against the law, and the men who ruled in favor of them sustained the law?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Undoubtedly; because the Supreme Court's decision was in favor of these claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. WEBB. Does the gentleman desire any more time?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I would like to clear up any doubt that exists in the mind of anyone.

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I have just glanced at the bill, and find the following language on page 2:

And that the accounting officers of the Treasury in the settlement of claims for longevity pay and allowances on account of services of officers in the Regular Army arising under section 15 of an act approved July 5, 1838, entitled "An act to increase the present Military Establishment of the United States, and for other purposes," and subsequent acts affecting longevity pay and allowances, shall credit as service in the Army of the United States, within the meaning of said acts, all services rendered as a cadet at the United States Military Academy and as an enlisted man or commissioned officer in the Regular and Volunteer Armies, in all cases in which heretofore this credit was disallowed by any such accounting officer of the Treasury, and no decision of a comptroller heretofore made against a claimant under said section 15 shall preclude a settlement under the terms of this act where the claim has not been paid.

Now, the question in my mind is, the gentleman says it applies to officers. It seems to apply to enlisted men.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And certainly goes back to 1838, and God knows how many of these claims on the half and half or quarter to the claimant if successful and three-quarters to the attorney are to be opened up for agents by the accounting officers of the Treasury. It seems to me, being somewhat familiar from ancient recollections with the activity of the Washington claim agent, that it is possibly a bill for the relief of the claim agent.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Well, if the gentleman says that——

Mr. CANNON. I say possibly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania (continuing). The gentleman ought to have some knowledge upon the subject, because I have introduced this bill myself into this House, and I challenge him to make any such insinuation as that with relation to myself. I would not stand it from anyone.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the gentleman ought not to get out of temper——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. My reason for introducing that bill was what I have told the Members of this House, that I have been instrumental, whether wisely or unwisely, in removing the bar against these men who had been in the academy who went into the service under the Confederate flag, and I felt it was simply rounding out an act of justice now to take up the cudgels of those who were the victims of an error and blunder in the administration of the Treasury Department of the United States.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me? Certainly, I had no intention of putting the gentleman out of temper nor do I impugn in any way his motives in any way, shape, or form. When he speaks of enlisted men and refers to the act of 1838, from my ignorance, without any reflection upon the gentleman, from my recollection of the activities of the claim agents in Washington, I merely asked for information, whether it is not probable or possible that they will get the most of whatever comes out of the Treasury, and how much is to come I do not know, and the gentleman does not seem to know.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The gentleman seems to be groping in the dark.

Mr. CANNON. Very likely; but I would like to walk in the light.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has more acquaintance with the claim agents than I have and therefore speaks out of the fullness of that experience, but I wish to say this: When he speaks of the enlisted man he must remember that the effect of this decision, while longevity applies to enlisted men, would not affect enlisted men unless they were graduates of West Point. There is nothing in that, and the committee has reported what they have ascertained to be the possible total aggregate of payments here. And in view of the fact that we have paid one set of these graduates of the academy upward of a million dollars and another set upward of $150,000, you have no right, morally or legally, to stop now and say you will not pay these men who are the victims of an improper decision.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I would like the gentleman to tell me how long a man who graduated from the Military Academy in 1880 served during the Civil War?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I do not know.

Mr. WALSH. Well, the gentleman made the statement that this was to cover the services of men who served during the Civil War.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Perhaps I may not have been clear enough in my expression to give clear color to what I had in mind. My thought is simply this, and the bill says so, that those who graduated from the academy are entitled to this longevity pay. Now, as a matter of sentiment, I referred to the fact that there were some of those who went into the Confederacy and therefore could not be paid on account of a certain section of the Revised Statutes. That has been repealed. Now, every graduate from the academy being entitled to longevity pay, why should these unfortunates have the door shut in their faces——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended two minutes in order that I may ask him a question.

Mr. WEBB. I yield the gentleman one minute additional.

Mr. BORLAND. I recall the gentleman stated, in regard to the question of the gentleman from Colorado, that the only persons affected by this were men who had served in the Civil War on the Union side and were graduates from the academy. I think possibly the gentleman may not have understood the question——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Maybe so.

Mr. BORLAND (continuing). Because I notice in his own report he gives the list of men who graduated from the academy in 1867, 1871, and 1877, and other dates subsequent to the Civil War, and it is perfectly apparent it is confined to graduates of the academy, some of whom may possibly have served in the Civil War.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is right.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. In the interest of perfecting the gentleman's bill, I would like to direct his attention to line 6, page 1, of the bill, where the expression is used "Supreme Court of the United States." Should it not be "Supreme Court in the United States against Morton" and not "Supreme Court of the United States against Morton"?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I have no objection at all to that being corrected.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. I thought the gentleman would like to have it correct.

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry before I begin.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. As I understand it, no one has been recognized for an hour in opposition to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. BORLAND. Well, may I not now ask for recognition in opposition to the bill in my own right?

Mr. WALSH. Is not a member of the committee entitled to that?

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman a member of the committee?

Mr. WALSH. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. In that case I will only ask for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] if he is opposed to the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Yes. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. I am much obliged, just the same.

Gentlemen, this bill ought not to pass, and I regret very much that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] urges it with such vim. By the report it appears that this is the twenty-first attempt that has been made to get these longevity claims paid. I remember that they were before our Committee on Claims in this House repeatedly and without success. They were put on a claims bill in the Senate at one time, which occasioned the defeat of a large number of very meritorious claims because these claims were injected into that claims bill. And this House has universally been opposed to the payment of these claims.

Now, let us get down to exactly what this question is. This is not confined to the Civil War, and, goodness knows, it has nothing whatever to do with the enlisted man, although the act of 1838, which was referred to, of course does apply in some of its provisions to the enlisted man.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Some gentlemen, I think, including the gentleman now speaking, spoke of a list of those who were to be paid under this bill. I have been unable to find it.

Mr. BORLAND. It is in the back part of it. There is no list of those that are to be paid. It is a list of those who have been paid. No enlisted man has got a look-in on this bill. No Union officer has got a look-in on this bill who was a volunteer officer, and the great percentage of Union officers were, of course, volunteer officers. This is confined to a very narrow class, a few of whom may survive as officers. The number of surviving Union officers is very, very small at this time. But the men who will be benefited by this bill are men who have had a public education in the Military Academy of the United States, whether they ever served a day in the war or not. They are the men to be benefited, and they are the narrow, prescribed, limited class that is to be benefited.

Now, what is it they ask? They ask that their longevity pay, which is supposed to be based on their service as officers of the United States, shall be dated back to cover the four years they were in the academy at Government expense.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Are you not mistaken when you say they ask to have their period of service dated back for four years to cover the academy, in view of the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided it must be dated back, because when in the academy they were in the service of their country?

Mr. BORLAND. If they were not asking it, the bill would not be here, I take it. So evidently they are asking it. Somebody may have decided they are entitled to it under a technical construction of the law, but they are asking for it, and it is useless to deny that.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think, in view of the fact that the claims of those who had left the service of their country, after being educated at West Point, and gone into the Confederacy have been adjudicated that those who stayed by the flag ought not to have their claims adjudicated?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think that clearly explains the situation. My recollection is that the only bar Congress removed was the proof of loyalty, leaving the question of time of presentation the same in both cases. The fact about the matter is that this ruling seems to have extended over a period of 18 years, and I can not reconcile my idea but that the mistake was the ruling of a single Comptroller of the Treasury. There could not be anything in that.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. RUSSELL. Do I understand you to say that if this bill is passed it will apply to those who have graduated at the Military Academy after four years?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. And that they will get their pay, although they may not have served in the Army afterwards?

Mr. BORLAND. The whole milk in the coconut is to give longevity pay to those who happened to be educated at public expense in the Military Academy and making their service begin when they entered the academy as cadets.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman did not say that they could possibly get their pay if they went into the Military Academy and did not go into the Army.

Mr. BORLAND. I said that they may have never gone into war. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] asked me a question, which I have distinctly answered, and that is whether the longevity pay was intended to cover their service in the academy. The gentleman's question was clear.

Mr. FIELDS. Under all the decisions that have been rendered since the administration of Comptroller Gilkeson the West Point service has been computed, has it not? Is it not computed now?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know whether it is or not. But it ought not to be.

Mr. FIELDS. If it has, without going into the question of whether it is right or not, if the officer whose longevity is computed to-day is getting credit for that, would it not be fair and just for those men who filed their claims within this period to have that discrimination in justice corrected? They were discriminated against as compared to the men who receive their longevity pay to-day.

Mr. BORLAND. I will say to the gentleman that it is the question that has been before the Committee on Claims of this House repeatedly, as to whether you ought to reach back to those men, and the Committee on Claims of the House were found against it, and our House agreed to that ruling. Now, some men are entitled to longevity pay. It is not necessary to go back into the distant past and allow these claims to be taken up and presented.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. May I ask a question? I want to get at the facts. Would the people to whom this bill relates, the beneficiaries under this bill, be entitled to the longevity pay but for the decisions of the comptroller?

Mr. BORLAND. I understand so.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Do the decisions of the Supreme Court and the decisions of those comptrollers agree?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know. I have not examined the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is a pretty vital point. If, under misapprehension of the law, comptrollers have rendered decisions that were erroneous in point of law and have been ascertained to be such by virtue of the decisions of the Supreme Court referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], ought we to allow that erroneous decision of the comptrollers to stand in the way of giving to people that to which they are entitled under the law of the land?

Mr. BORLAND. I am quite sure that if these people have any claim in law or equity against the United States they would not be here asking for the enactment of this bill. I think that is perfectly apparent. I do not know under what analogy they ask for it, or under what decision they refer to, but I am confident that if they had any remedy in law or equity they would pursue it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The reason why I asked that question is this, that the only reason why these people are asking for this legislation is that they are handicapped by an erroneous ruling of some antecedent comptroller which the present comptroller will not set aside.

Mr. BORLAND. I heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] make that statement, but I do not know the facts.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It seems to me that is a vital question, whether that is so or not.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman happen to know how many of these claims are now in the hands of the original claimants?

Mr. BORLAND. I have not the ghost of an idea as to how many of these claims are in the hands of the original claimants. There is no way of ascertaining even the gross amount of the claims.

Mr. DENISON. Is there any law now in force that governs the collection of these claims as to whether or not they can be assigned to other persons?

Mr. BORLAND. There is a law, of course, on the subject. The gentleman knows that the Court of Claims makes the findings of fact, which it submits to the Congress, but it has no power of rendering a judgment. It makes merely a finding of fact, as it ascertains the same to be in its judgment, and Congress has the complete power to approve that finding of fact if it sees fit. That course was pursued in this case and the finding of fact was made, and the Congress has refused to confirm that finding of fact by making the appropriation, and now it is proposed to give the Court of Claims the power to enter judgment against the United States, notwithstanding the fact that the claims have been pending in Congress for 10 years past.

These men have had a military education at the expense of the United States, costing $20,000 in round numbers to each man, and they were paid to take it. The United States confers an education free, at a cost of $20,000, to every man who is educated there. It seems to me it is a strange thing in time of war to come in here and ask that half a million dollars or a million dollars be paid to men who have already had that advantage.

The question to-day is, Why is West Point? When we need officers we have to go out and get volunteer officers. That is what happened to us in every war we have had. When we got this National Army we trained 43,000 officers in training camps in three months.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. I say we have trained 43,000 officers in training camps in three months. We took the bright young men from your district and from mine and sent them out there, and in three months' time they came out able to command this great army of democracy. And yet these men setting up these claims had four years of training, and some of them have never fired a gun in defense of the United States.

We are depending to-day upon 43,000 young Americans, who have had but three months' training in a training camp, to command our armies when we are facing the most desperate fight that our Government ever faced; and here is a lot of men who had four years' training at Government expense, and were paid to take it, asking for longevity pay. I venture the assertion that most of them never rendered any service to the Government.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Those 43,000 officers that the gentleman refers to were trained chiefly by West Point graduates, were they not?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I do not say that they were chiefly trained by West Point graduates. I want to call the attention of my friend from New York to this fact, that before this war broke out the great majority of the officers of the line in the United States Army were not West Point graduates. I will call on the members of the Committee on Military Affairs for verification of that statement, that the majority of the officers of the line in the United States Army have never been through West Point. I have never been able to understand why a great military academy such as we have, maintained at enormous expense, could never furnish more than a minor percentage of American officers in time of peace, and not furnish even a nucleus in time of war. These men in the training camps were trained by men a majority of whom had never seen West Point, and most of whom had served in the National Guard of the various States.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. Does this bill cover all graduates from the academy from the time the academy was organized?

Mr. BORLAND. Apparently.

Mr. MAPES. Who happened to have their longevity claims filed?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. And who filed their claims from 1890 to 1908?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; that is apparently the case.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. How does it happen that such a large proportion of the graduates of the academy filed their claims during this time?

Mr. BORLAND. I have no way of answering that, except as the gentleman from Illinois says. There are always attorneys here interested in practicing before the Court of Claims, and occasionally they ransack the country and get a set of claims and bunch them up and get them before the Court of Claims. I have seen that done frequently, but I have no personal knowledge in this case.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. Is it not true that the reason why they were filed at that time was that shortly before that the Supreme Court had sustained the validity of the claims? Is not that the reason why they were filed at that time?

Mr. BORLAND. I imagine that some attorneys had circularized the country as soon as the decision of the Supreme Court was made.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I know nothing about this bill except what I have heard in the debate, and I do not know how I shall vote on it; but it seems to me the gentleman has directed his argument against the policy of paying this longevity to the officers during the time they were in West Point. I understand the Supreme Court has so construed the law, and that other men have been paid under the same circumstances before this decision of the comptroller, and other men have been paid since that decision. Now, is it fair that you should segregate a certain class and say that merely on account of a decision of the comptroller, which is apparently against the Supreme Court, they should not be paid while the others are paid?

Mr. BORLAND. That seems to be the argument that is made, but from my standpoint these gentlemen have no equity. From my standpoint they might stand on a strictly technical legal right, which I think would be a gross injustice to the Government if they did stand on it, and not a very high evidence of patriotism; but if they had a strict legal right we might have to pay them. But when they come here appealing to equity, appealing to the conscience of Congress, they have universally been met with a refusal, and that is what they are appealing to to-day. They are appealing to sentiment, to conscience and equity. They admit that they have not any strictly legal right.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. McKENZIE. In my judgment, the matter of longevity pay is a question of law, and according to this report the law of 1870 is as follows:

There shall be allowed and paid to each and every commissioned officer below the rank of brigadier general, including chaplains and others having assimilated rank or pay, 10 per cent of their current yearly pay for each and every term of five years of service.

Now, the Supreme Court of the United States has ruled that the four years spent in the Military Academy shall be counted as time served in the Army in figuring longevity pay. It seems to me that the law is just as plain as A, B, C, and if a man has a legal claim for longevity pay, I do not see why it is necessary to have any legislation to enable him to get it.

Mr. BORLAND. That is the whole answer to it. If there were any legal claim, based upon a decision of the Supreme Court, there would be no necessity of appealing to the extraordinary powers of Congress to pass a claims bill. That is perfectly plain. Evidently they have not got a legal claim, or they would not be here.

Mr. REED. Are some of these claims to pay the heirs of dead men?

Mr. BORLAND. I suppose so. I say I know nothing about the claims except the fact that we have had them up before Congress in previous sessions, and there has always been a disposition manifested by Congress, especially by the House of Representatives, not to pay these claims, not to go back into the past, and allow these claims to be drummed up against the United States and bunched at this time. It does seem to me that if we took that position in time of peace, when this Government had a comparatively small military burden upon it, when we might perhaps indulge this idea that Army officers were somewhat men of the rank of nobility in our country, we certainly can not take that position in time of war. A man who goes through West Point does not get a patent of nobility. He gets an education at public expense to serve his Nation, and I have never been able to believe that he was entitled to any special consideration because he had an opportunity to go to West Point. Thousands of other good men do not have the opportunity, yet when the time comes they serve their country just as bravely and just as capably as the men who went through West Point. They did not have the opportunity, and we are just simply making discrimination in this longevity matter between men who had a splendid opportunity to go through West Point, and to be paid for doing it, and men who served their country without any such inducement. I do not think we ought to make that distinction. I do not think there is any equity in this claim, and if there was any law on their side they would not be here appealing to the sentiment about the blue and the gray. The claim ought to be defeated. [Applause.] I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I know no one will think I am unduly zealous in behalf of these people whose claims are now being considered before the House. There is no reason, political or otherwise, why I should espouse their cause, except a sense of justice. I am as much opposed to a law that makes the service of a cadet while in the academy count in computing his longevity pay as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] seems to be. But that is not the question we are discussing and has nothing to do with it. Any gentleman who tries to confuse the issue by pretending that we are determining whether it is wise or not to count as service the time a cadet is in the academy as a part of his service on which longevity pay is based is either himself mistaken as to the issue raised in this bill or is knowingly or otherwise deceiving the committee, because the sole question here involved, as anyone can soon find if he takes the trouble to inquire, is whether men who stand in the selfsame relation to both the law and the fact shall receive the same treatment. Under the act of Congress of 1838 for the reorganization of the Army, the question of whether the longevity pay of an officer in the Army should be based upon his service after graduation or should include also the time he spent in the academy arose. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that in computing his longevity pay the four years that he was a student in the academy should be taken into consideration. That became the law of the land, because the Supreme Court said that was the intent of Congress. A Comptroller of the Treasury undertook to decide that he was not bound by the law—in other words, that he was not bound by a decision of the Supreme Court. All those who presented their claims to prior comptrollers were paid. All those who presented them to this particular comptroller were denied. Those who presented their claims to comptrollers who came after him were paid. Now, the question here is simply this: Whether men's claim for compensation resting upon the same facts and under the same law should be dealt with alike. Now, shall we recognize as binding upon the conscience of this country an erroneous ruling of a comptroller is up to us, or shall we mete out even-handed justice. That is the only question here involved. If we want to take advantage of a technicality or the mistake of an officer of this Government, and thereby deny equal justice to men who have performed equal services, why, bless your hearts, vote against this bill. If you want to put yourselves on record as being in favor of denying equal rights to men whose claims rest upon exactly the same facts and law, then hide behind the technical erroneous ruling of a Comptroller of the Treasury that was in contradiction to a ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States. You will accomplish that end.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is there any question as to the ruling of that particular comptroller being wrong? In other words, was the ruling made by the other comptrollers right, in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court, or was this ruling of this comptroller wrong?

Mr. CARAWAY. Absolutely wrong. The comptroller who came after, however, I think wisely decided that he was not a court of review; that the claims passed upon by the prior comptroller had been settled as far as he was concerned; and that he could not review the decisions of the prior comptroller. He was acting clearly within the law. He said that the comptroller was wrong, as everybody knows, but that he had no right to reverse it, and that no one could reverse it except the Congress of the United States, and we are to decide whether we will do it or not. Why, a man who would avail himself of that plea in this matter would plead the statute of limitations to avoid the payment of a just debt. The question is whether you want to plead a technicality to relieve the Government of its moral obligation.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. This bill comes from the Judiciary Committee. Has not this exact question been presented to the Committee on Claims?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not know as to that.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it not within the jurisdiction of the Claims Committee?

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, I do not submit my conscience to the Committee on Claims any more than I do to a Comptroller of the Treasury who makes a mistake. The question is whether it is just and right. Now I have no interest in it; my folks were all on the other side in the dispute. There is not a dollar going to anybody in my State. I never heard of anybody who was to profit by this legislation, but I would not deny justice to the blackest nigger that ever walked the earth under a technicality. [Laughter and applause.] And I would not permit my Government to do it if I could prevent it.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not want the gentleman to get away from that question that I asked.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. BORLAND. I am asking the gentleman whether it is not the uniform custom for the Court of Claims to bring its findings to Congress before the claims are paid and have them allowed? Why is it necessary that the gentleman's committee should bring in a bill authorizing the Court of Claims to enter up judgment?

Mr. CARAWAY. Anyone who understands the rules of the House will understand why it came to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I will not try to enter into an explanation of the rules of the House. The committee had jurisdiction of it. We believe that the country ought not to refuse to meet its legal obligations, and we voted for it.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. COX. If we do not pass this bill we punish the men who presented claims in their favor in time.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course we do, and cover ourselves with infamy in doing it. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman in all sincerity feel that there ought to be some limitation placed in the bill as to the amount that would be allowed attorneys?

Mr. CARAWAY. If there is an attorney in it, I never heard of it. I can say truthfully that no attorney came before the committee, no attorney mentioned it to me, and no living soul has asked me to vote for the bill. I never heard of an attorney or agent or anybody else interested in it except these people, and they were not pushing it. It was a question that addressed itself to the conscience of the committee, and I voted for it.

Mr. COX. I am not trying to impute anything to the gentleman.

Mr. CARAWAY. I understand that. I want no attorneys or agents to profit by the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] 15 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I shall want all that time, but I want to understand this bill. First, by way of suggestion, no man in the House has a greater respect for the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] than I have, and that is also true of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. I am not impugning the motive of any Member of Congress, but I can not quite agree with the gentleman from Arkansas. The gentleman from Arkansas intimated that a man who invoked the statute of limitations was not honest. Now, as I understand, these people who were diligent have not received their pay, but if they are entitled to anything why do they want legislation?

Mr. MADDEN. Because they did not receive it on account of the Comptroller of the Treasury at that time refusing to follow the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely, and lo and behold, somebody evidently got the legislation. The Comptroller of the Treasury passed on these claims for a period of 10 years and rejected them.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The history is that in the beginning this longevity was not permitted to cover the period while the men served in the Military Academy. The Supreme Court of the United States in 1884 decided that that must be counted. Then, for a period from 1884 down to 1890 all these claims that were presented were paid. Then, from that period, under a ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury, claims that were presented to him were ruled out arbitrarily. The next comptroller that came in allowed the claims that were presented to him, but said that he would not review those that his predecessor had passed upon.

Mr. CANNON. I think that is the usual course as to a predecessor.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. But not where there has been a blunder by refusing to follow the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; in many cases that has happened, where the Comptroller of the Treasury has adjudicated, and then if anything happens that the claims are established subsequently by a decision of the court without express legislation on the part of Congress the claims that have been adjudicated by the comptroller are not paid or readjudicated. The very object of the gentleman by this legislation is to get authorization, as I understand it, for their adjudication. Now, the gentleman from Arkansas I am sure is not familiar with legislation had in recent years. After the close of the Civil War there were a lot of claims for back pay and bounty, and they kept coming in and coming in.

They were adjudicated, hundreds and thousands, I suppose hundreds of thousands of dollars, where they had not been paid, and where the records showed they had not been paid. Congress in its wisdom passed a statute of limitations and said that after the year 1912, I think it was, or possibly 1913, it does not make any difference, no claims should be considered thereafter filed. I have made several efforts to try to get rid of that act because I have a lot of constituents who are old, where the back pay and bounty is due them, but on account of that legislation which has been had by Congress and within the last decade, there is nothing doing. I speak whereof I know. People die, the personnel of Congress changes, we cross over, and there come up new claims and old claims that may not have been just, with a new set of legislators, or with the death of witnesses that knew they were not just, and then comes a second trial. After all, I think there is wisdom in statutes of limitations amongst individuals, and I wish to God there was a limitation in the Constitution of the United States, 6 years or 10 years or 20 years, as the case may be, because after claims have been rejected time and time and time again they spring up frequently with every new Congress. Let me tell you what has happened, and I speak whereof I know. Take the contracts, for instance, had during the Civil War for the building of gunboats and for services to the Government. Some of them were settled and receipts given in full payment, and yet year after year and Congress after Congress, when claims were presented for those things they were turned down, but finally many of them were paid by express legislation. If there had been a limitation in the Constitution providing that when there was settlement once made and the money was received in full payment they could not be again paid, that thing would not have happened.

I want to say frankly I do not understand why this bill should pass, if it does pass, unless some of it is stricken out. It is said that it is confined only to West Pointers, who can take under this legislation, having the four years in West Point counted for longevity.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is what the Supreme Court said.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; that is what the United States Supreme Court said. What does this mean? It harks back to an act of 1838. I do not know how much significance there is in these claims, whether they are claims that have been pending or claims that have been rejected. We find them in the list of enlisted men. Take page 2 of the bill, going to line 10—all services rendered as a cadet at the United States Military Academy—

Now, you might stop right there, if they alone are to be relieved; but we find further—and as an enlisted man or commissioned officer in the Regular and Volunteer Armies, in all cases in which heretofore this credit was disallowed by any such accounting officer of the Treasury, and no decision of a comptroller heretofore made against a claimant under said section 15 shall preclude a settlement under the terms of this act where the claim has not been paid.

That covers the whole shooting match.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; it does not.

Mr. CANNON. Then what is the use of it?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; I am seeking knowledge in good faith.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Just those claims which were proved before a comptroller and disallowed. They are easily ascertained.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, but the legislation is broader than that. Let me read it:

And that the accounting officers of the Treasury in the settlement of claims for longevity pay and allowances on account of services of officers in the Regular Army arising under section 15 of an act approved July 5, 1838, entitled "An act to increase the present Military Establishment of the United States, and for other purposes," and subsequent acts affecting longevity pay and allowances—

Longevity pay and allowances.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Go on.

Mr. CANNON. It continues—shall credit as service in the Army of the United States, within the meaning of said acts, all services rendered as a cadet at the United States Military Academy.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. See how it is narrowed.

Mr. CANNON. But why did you broaden it here?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Any lawyer would understand why it was broadened there. It is a recital of those acts; that is all.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; here is where the broadening comes in—and as an enlisted man or commissioned officer of the Regular and Volunteer Armies, in all cases in which heretofore this credit was disallowed by any such accounting officer of the Treasury—

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. You see it is limited again.

Mr. CANNON (continuing)— and no decision of a comptroller heretofore made against a claimant under said section 15 shall preclude a settlement under the terms of this act where the claim has not been paid.

Now, what is the use of putting in the enlisted man?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The act put it in.

Mr. CANNON. Did the act put it in?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; it is only a recital.

Mr. CANNON. But could the enlisted man come in now if he had been rejected?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; unless his claim was before the comptroller and rejected. It is limited to that. It is limited to those whose credit for their service at the academy had not been accounted for, and whose claims were proved before the comptroller.

Mr. CANNON. But the enlisted man did not have any four years at West Point. The decision of the Supreme Court did not cover him.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No. Will the gentleman pardon me for just a suggestion?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The act covers the enlisted men, and there were certain conditions of service as enlisted men that were allowed to be counted by the officer when he became an officer. That is the general provision of the act, but we recite that act simply to identify the law. Under that we simply say that where the service at the academy has not been accounted and proof made before the comptroller, those claims shall be taken up and reconsidered as they ought to be.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. The act of 1838 provides for additional pay, then in form of additional rations, for each five years of service "in the Army." This was first held to apply only to the time of the commission, afterwards service in the ranks as an enlisted man was counted, and then the question came up whether enlistments in the Military Academy—and when men are appointed to West Point they do enlist—should be counted as enlistment.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. And that was decided favorably by the Supreme Court in the decision cited here, so that the question of the other enlistment in the ranks does not come in here at all. That was not in the Supreme Court decision.

The decision was merely that West Point service is enlistment.

Mr. CANNON. That could be done without covering enlisted men or volunteer officers; it is not necessary to cover them.

Mr. PLATT. It is already covered without being in here.

Mr. FIELDS. They are already covered by the language of the statute now. That only refers to the law.

Mr. CANNON. This language takes that act and all other acts subsequent. What would the gentleman think if I proposed to strike out on motion the words "and as an enlisted or commissioned officer in the Regular or Volunteer Armies in all cases in which heretofore this credit was disallowed by any such accounting officer of the Treasury"? Now, it looks like, to me, whoever drafted this bill——

Mr. FIELDS. That would be a discrimination wholly in favor of the West Point man.

Mr. CANNON. Well.

Mr. FIELDS. If under the law some man was entitled to this longevity pay who had served a certain time as an enlisted man, he is being discriminated against under the law that is now on the statute books.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I had supposed from reading this bill and what has been said about it that the people who were to be relieved were those who had been denied four years in the Military Academy.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is right—by the comptroller.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says that is right—by the comptroller. It seems some have been allowed. What is the use of spreading it beyond that?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It does not go beyond that. If the gentleman will permit an interrogation, I would like to quote from a letter from the Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. May I have a minute just to make this inquiry?

Mr. WALSH. I yield the gentleman from Illinois one minute.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I quote from the letter of Secretary of War Baker:

> The question of counting cadet service and service as enlisted men arose some years ago, and the then Comptroller of the Treasury ruled that service as a cadet at West Point was not considered service in the Army. The matter finally reached the Supreme Court, and on March 11, 1889, that body ventured a decision that—
> "Cadets at West Point were always part of the Army, and that service as a cadet was always actual service in the Army," etc.
> It appears that the claims of all of those officers which were presented prior to 1908 were disallowed, but that the officers who presented identical claims after another decision of the assistant comptroller in May, 1908, had their claims allowed and paid. The present Comptroller of the Treasury declares himself powerless to reopen such claims, no matter how just they may be, unless authorized by Congress to do so.
> Accordingly, I have the honor to recommend that suitable legislation be enacted authorizing the Comptroller of the Treasury to reopen the claims of all officers who are entitled to longevity pay under the act cited.
> Very respectfully, NEWTON D. BAKER.
> Secretary of War.

Mr. CANNON. Now, the gentleman's bill goes further——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It does not go a step beyond that.

Mr. CANNON. Then I think I do not understand the English language. I have already read it twice and shall, when opportunity offers, propose an amendment to strike out the language from lines 11 to 17, inclusive.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, if I correctly apprehend the facts of this case and I think I do, then the merits of the pending proposition are beyond controversy. It is often said that the diligent man ought to be rewarded for his diligence, but according to the history of this case it is the slothful who have been rewarded, while the diligent have been punished. The committee ought to have in mind that the statute which determined the rights of the men who have received longevity pay is the same statute which is relied upon to establish the rights of the beneficiaries of the pending resolutions. This statute has been interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States. It has also been interpreted by the comptrollers. One comptroller interpreting it, in advance of the decision of the Supreme Court held that it did not operate to include for the purpose of computing longevity pay the time spent by an officer as a student at West Point. Later the Supreme Court held that the time spent at the Military Academy, was to be counted as a part of an officer's service in the Army. Thereupon a number of officers who had noted the ruling of the comptroller excluding this time and therefore had never made application to have it considered in computing their longevity, were emboldened by this decision to submit their case to the comptroller. All of these applicants received longevity pay conformably to the interpretation of the statute established by the Supreme Court. The officers who had gone before the comptroller prior to the decision, and whose applications had been rejected, thereupon sought to secure the benefit of the same decision, by presenting their cases anew to the comptroller. What happened to these officers? Why, the comptroller held in substance, that he was not controlled or affected as to these cases, by anything that the Supreme Court had done, or any ruling that it had made, in interpreting the statute—that even if this court did hold that the ruling of antecedent comptrollers on the precise point presented was erroneous, and that service at West Point was to be considered in computing longevity pay, the comptrollers were a law unto themselves, and he would not undertake to reverse the antecedent ruling, but would reject the new applications, substantially on the ground, that the matter was res judicata. But the same comptroller who rejected the claim of an officer on this ground passed the claims of other officers whose cases, on the merits, were precisely those of the first officer, differing only in that they had never been presented to a comptroller, and therefore never had been rejected under an admittedly erroneous construction of the basic statute.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think the comptrollers went quite that far. But they simply said they would not sit as a court of appeals under the decision.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The effect was the same.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The effect was the same.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If we agree upon the effect, there is no occasion to concern ourselves over verbal distinctions, or differentiations. What does the pending bill propose to do? In this connection I will refer to a statement made, I believe, by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] as follows: "If these people have any rights under the law, why do they not go to the courts? Why do they come to Congress with this bill?" The answer to these queries is very simple. These claimants can not go to the Court of Claims for the reason the time has expired within which they could sue in the Court of Claims. They can go to the comptroller, but this step would not avail them for the reason that the comptroller will not consider their applications, on the ground that the action of a former comptroller rejecting their claims, even if that action was error, renders their case, res judicata. In substance this high and mighty Treasury official announces that even though the Supreme Court has construed the statute contrariwise to the view taken by antecedent comptrollers he prefers to follow those comptrollers, in preference to a decision of our greatest court of last resort. Hence the intended beneficiaries of this bill are barred in both forums. This statute simply declares that the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to entertain the claims of officers who are entitled to the benefit of the decision of the Supreme Court, but who have been debarred therefrom by the rulings of one or more comptrollers. The statute might fairly be denominated a statute to make a decision of the Supreme Court effectual against an opposing ruling of a comptroller.

Should the beneficiaries of this bill bring themselves, upon the facts, within the benefit of this decision of the Supreme Court construing a statute which is the basic law for these cases then they will secure the same longevity pay which other officers upon the same state of facts have secured, no more, no less. The merits of the case presented for these claimants is manifest. On the one hand is a decision of the Supreme Court announcing that the statute relied upon by these claimants, includes the time spent at West Point by a student, as a part of his Army service, and should be considered in computing longevity pay. On the other hand, are the decisions of one or more comptrollers construing the same statute, and holding that time spent at West Point should be excluded in computing this pay. It should not be difficult to determine which ruling should be the determining authority.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. What does the gentleman have to say as to the purpose or effect of those words to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] called attention to in lines 11 and 12 on page 2:

And as an enlisted man or commissioned officer in the Regular and Volunteer Armies.

Can he state whether this adds anything or whether it would subtract anything from the bill?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will refer the gentleman to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], who has discussed that phase of the situation very fully.

Mr. TILSON. I was called out of the House at the moment, and I did not hear it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In reply to a query by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the gentleman from Pennsylvania answered very fully the question now asked by the gentleman from Connecticut. This bill affords a relief to which its intended beneficiaries are very plainly entitled. These officers are asking for nothing but what others standing on the same footing as themselves have long since received. They are asking for something that should be accorded to them as a matter of right. They are not suppliants asking bounty or seeking a voluntary donation. They were diligent in presenting their claims and, by an erroneous ruling of a comptroller, have been punished for their diligence. In contravention of the accepted rule of action, the slothful in this case have been rewarded for their slothfulness.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated, and well stated, that we are not considering the justice or injustice of allowing the service of four years in West Point in arriving at the longevity pay. That has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States. I am frank to say that I think that law was wrong and that a law should never have been passed allowing this four years' service to be computed. But that law was passed and the Supreme Court of the United States held that it was valid.

Now, that law was passed upon by the Supreme Court in 1884 and for 10 years thereafter those claimants who presented their claims to the Comptroller of the Treasury received payment of them. All claims were not filed at the same time. They continued to file them, and in 1890 Comptroller Gilkeson, a new comptroller who came in at that time, reversed the decision of his predecessors and, we might say, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and during his tenure in office he refused to pay these claims. After he went out of office the claims continued to come to the comptroller and his successor reversed his (Gilkeson's) ruling, and said that the claims were valid, and that he, acting upon the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, would pay them, though he did not have the right to review those claims that had been filed during the tenure of his predecessor and were passed upon or rejected by him. So those are the claims that this legislation proposes to relieve.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the Judiciary Committee know how many of these claims there are and when the claims were pressed before the Auditor of the Treasury?

Mr. FIELDS. I will say to the gentleman I am not a member of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I thought the gentleman was.

Mr. FIELDS. I am a member of the Military Committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I can find nothing in the report. It does not mention the number of the claimants.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It summarizes the amount.

Mr. FIELDS. The number does not affect the equity of the claims. If A, B, and C were claimants upon an equal footing and A filed his claim prior to the administration or the tenure in office of Comptroller Gilkeson, and his claim was paid, and C filed his claim after the service of Comptroller Gilkeson, and his claim was paid, can we take advantage of B, who filed his claim before Comptroller Gilkeson, whose decision conflicted with the decisions of both his predecessor and successor and the decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I yield.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman agree with the position of the distinguished lawyer from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] that Congress ought to rectify erroneous decisions of Federal courts, and that every time a judge is wrong Congress ought to sit as a court of appeals and set him right?

Mr. FIELDS. Well, I have seen some decisions that I thought Congress ought to show its disapproval of.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman think injustice has often been shown to claimants?

Mr. FIELDS. I will say that this bill, if enacted into law, will only put the decisions of all Comptrollers in line with the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have had a little more time than that, but possibly I can get through in three minutes.

I am entirely opposed to longevity pay on account of service in the Military Academy, but that is not the question now before the House. My vote upon that is foreclosed, and the vote of a large number of the Members of this House is foreclosed, by their previous action. Some four years ago, I think it was, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], who has presented this bill, introduced a bill which permitted certain officers who had been in the service of the Confederacy as well to present and have allowed their claims for longevity pay of this character under the same statute. The bill passed this House, as I remember, without a dissenting vote, at that time. It allowed exactly the same kind of claims. No possible reason could be given for allowing those claims that could not be given for allowing these that we have before the House at this time, and possibly some reasons might have been urged why those claims should not be allowed which would not operate against the claims we are now considering.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Is there anything in the language of this bill that gives the volunteer officer and the private soldier the same status that the Supreme Court of the United States gave the West Point cadets?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have only three minutes and I can not go outside, if the gentleman will pardon me, and into that question.

I want to say a word further with reference to the bill that was before the House on the other occasion. At that time the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] made a most eloquent speech in favor of it—a speech, I might say, that is one of the classics of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—and unless my friend from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is prepared to say now he was entirely carried away by the eloquence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, so that he hardly knew what he was doing at the time, I am unable to see how he can consistently vote against this bill. I take it, the gentleman was present on that occasion, as he is one of the most diligent Members of the House and always attending to business here.

Now, just a word further in reference to the statute of limitation. Without carrying the argument as far as the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] went, I will say the principle of the statute of limitations has no application to this situation whatever. We apply the statute of limitations because we say if a man is not diligent and does not present his claim within a reasonable time, we have a right to presume that his claim is not just. That is the principle upon which the statute of limitations is founded. That is the legal principle upon which it rests. But in this particular case, from the extraordinary circumstances that have arisen, a man who was diligent in presenting his claim early is debarred from presenting it now, and having it allowed, and others who put off the presentation of their claims until such a time when, if at all, the statute of limitations ought to apply, were permitted to present them and have their claims paid, and they were paid.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I want to ask a question for information.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I understood the gentleman to say that the claims that had been filed prior to 1890 had been paid.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand the situation, there were three sets of decisions with reference to this matter by different comptrollers. The early comptrollers ruled that these allowances ought to be paid. Then came in other comptrollers who ruled that they ought not to be paid; and then came in a third and last set, after the decision of the Supreme Court, and who were in accord with its decision and who admitted that these claims ought to be paid, but said that they ought not to sit as a court of appeals on the decisions of their predecessors. The result was that the later comptrollers paid new claims that were presented to them, but refused to pay the claims that we are now considering, holding that they were adjudicated by their predecessors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the principle in this bill which Congress will have to determine is simply whether or not we will put this class of claims upon an equality with others of the same kind.

Now, here, very briefly speaking, is the situation: There were claims presented for longevity which were presented in time and within the statute of limitations. They were refused by a certain Comptroller of the Treasury Department. After this had been done, subsequent comptrollers granted the allowance of this class of claims.

Now, this class of claims is based upon this condition of law and of fact: The Supreme Court of the United States has said that as a matter of law the claimants are entitled to the payment of these claims. The Court of Claims has said that as a matter of fact the claimants are entitled to the payment of these claims. Both of those propositions have been adjudicated by the erroneous decision of a certain comptroller. A certain part of those claims were not allowed. Now, these parties can not make these claims because of the fact that the statute of limitations runs against them. So you are confronted with this proposition: Are you willing, as a matter of justice, to remove the bar of the statute of limitations in this class of cases? As my colleague [Mr. GREEN of Iowa] has just shown, the object of the statute of limitations is to secure the determination of claims in a timely manner and before the evidence is lost. That has been done, and the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court have decided that the claims are just. Now it is for us to say that they should be paid if they are established in accordance with law and fact.

I want to call the attention of Members of the House to this fact, that we have removed the bar of the statute of limitations and other bars against all those who served in the Confederate Army, and now if we refuse to do so in the present bill we make a discrimination against the Union soldier if we now refuse to remove the bar. If gentlemen are willing to do that, then they ought to vote against this bill. If you are willing to place the Union soldier upon exactly the same plane of equality that you have by unanimous consent voted to place the Confederate soldier, then you ought to vote for this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would it not be a concrete statement to say that the object and effect of this bill is to remove from a sort of twilight zone a class of claims that are on exactly the same basis as claims that were allowed theretofore and claims that were allowed thereafter?

Mr. TOWNER. I could not concede that it was a twilight zone when we have an absolute decision by the Supreme Court and by the Court of Claims both on the question of law and fact.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the adverse decision was not made by the Supreme Court, but it was made by a comptroller.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; by the decision of a comptroller who refused to obey the decision of the Supreme Court. But we must either condemn the action that we took when we removed the bar from the Confederate soldiers or we must now give the same right to the Union soldier.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. How long does the statute of limitations run?

Mr. TOWNER. Six years.

Mr. WALSH. Mr Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there is some misunderstanding, because the report accompanying this bill is not quite as clear as might be as to some of the matters in this case. It recites the three longevity statutes—that of 1838, that of 1878, and that of 1881—the first being the ration statute, where the officers were allowed an additional ration for every five years they served. Once in a while we hear somebody talking in favor of that nowadays, but that was abolished or computed into money in 1870. Then comes the act of 1881. Each one of these acts provides that the actual time of service "in the Army or the Navy" shall be allowed to officers in computing their pay, and so forth. Of course, inasmuch as many men obtained commissions without going to West Point, the question as to whether their service in the Army as enlisted men should be counted in computing their longevity pay is a question that is quite pertinent, but it does not clearly appear in this report how it was settled.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I was trying to find out what longevity pay is and what is the nature of the claim.

Mr. PLATT. As I understand, every officer at the end of five years gets an addition of 10 per cent as longevity pay. He may be a captain for a long time when there is no war, but every time he passes five years he gets an increase of pay. I am right about that, am I not?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. He does not get additional pay until after he has been in the Army a certain time. The question first came up, if he had first served in the ranks as an enlisted man whether he could count his term of service as an enlisted man toward longevity pay. As I understand it, the Comptroller of the Treasury in 1838 first decided against this, but sometime afterwards this decision was reversed. Then still later the question came up as to whether service at West Point was not also "service in the Army" within the meaning of the statute. The Supreme Court decided in 1884 that it was; that a man was a member of the Army or of the Navy when he enlisted or on admission to West Point or Annapolis, and we know that when a man does go to West Point or Annapolis he is subject to the orders of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and can be sent to the front at once. Subsequent decisions, including that in the Watson case in 1899, extended the scope of the decision of 1884.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. REED. I understand the statement has been made that the comptroller decided at first as to a part of the claim. Did not the comptroller grant some portion of their claim? But they are now claiming more. Did he not settle with them for a part of the period, but not for four years?

Mr. PLATT. I think not. I think this particular comptroller, if the gentleman is referring to Mr. Gilkeson and his immediate successors, 1890–1908, ruled against the whole thing. Before his time the claims were allowed. Then he disregarded the Supreme Court decision and ruled against them, and while he was in no claims were allowed. Then after his time, after 1908, they were allowed again; but those claims that came in during the period 1890–1908 were held by later comptrollers to have been adjudicated. This bill simply allows the claims of that one period to be brought before the Court of Claims and determined.

Mr. REED. Could not some applicant have had four or five years' service in addition to the service at West Point?

Mr. PLATT. It is not a question of discrimination against men who got their commissions through enlistment in the Army first or their going to West Point. It has been possible for men to enlist in the Army and get commissions quicker than West Point men get them. I know of a case myself of a boy who failed to get an appointment to West Point who enlisted in the Army and got a commission in three years. Those things happen. The law allows the boy to count his three years of enlisted service in computing his longevity pay, but West Point service as the law now stands is not counted.

Mr. BORLAND. My understanding is clearly that the only matter in dispute is the four years' service in the academy.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; for the particular cases mentioned, others having been decided.

Mr. BORLAND. Then that is the only matter affected by this bill. The enlisted man is not benefited by it.

Mr. PLATT. The enlisted man afterwards commissioned had already been benefited by earlier decisions. As I understand it, the decision of the Supreme Court in 1884 went to that one point, whether the four years at West Point were to be computed as enlistment in the Army.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; that has been repeatedly stated here on the floor.

Mr. PLATT. It seems to me that this bill simply provides for equal treatment for all cases of the same kind. Many of these claims have been paid. Others exactly the same have not been paid and in justice should be paid.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, we shall have only one more speech. I desire the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to use his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has 5 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has 21 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, it is, of course, perfectly obvious that a boy who goes to West Point or to Annapolis and receives an education there at the public expense is not entitled to anything out of the Public Treasury because of any sacrifice he has made or any public service that he has rendered. There is no real merit in the claims of these officers who are now seeking to get something extra because they were permitted to go to West Point when other boys were denied that privilege. The claims stand purely upon a technicality, that an alleged discrimination was practiced against them. They have no merit in themselves. Their only argument is that somebody else got it and therefore they ought to have it. That is all there is in this bill.

Now, it is the present policy of Congress not to allow such a claim to be made. That policy is found in the act of Congress passed after this decision of the Supreme Court, which provides that no officer shall be allowed to add to his term of service for the purpose of getting longevity pay the time that he served in the academy. I find it as applicable to the Navy in the act of March 4, 1913, which provides as follows:

Hereafter the service of a midshipman at the United States Naval Academy, or that of a cadet at the United States Military Academy who may hereafter be appointed to the United States Naval Academy or the United States Military Academy shall not be counted in computing for any purpose the length of service of any officer in the Navy or in the Marine Corps.

The same kind of a statute has been passed applicable to service in the Army. Therefore it is the policy of Congress not to recognize at this time any such claim whatsoever. So that so far as those are concerned who have gone to the academy since this statute was passed, they will be discriminated against if we now turn back and give it to those who went to the academy before that time.

In 1838 it was held by the comptroller that those who had gone to the Military Academy should not be allowed to compute the time they were there as a part of their service in order to get this longevity allowance. That ruling remained in force for years and years, and while it was so in force and while the law was being so construed, Congress passed an act allowing longevity pay to officers in the Army. That was the beginning of it. Congress passed that act giving this longevity pay at a time when it was being uniformly held that the time spent at the academy could not be counted in. Congress undoubtedly, so far as longevity pay is concerned, never for a moment intended that boys favored by an education at the academy should have anything additional on account of it. It was after Congress had passed that statute allowing longevity pay, at a time when the law had long been held to be that time spent at the academy could not be computed or added to other service that the Supreme Court held that technically service at the academy was service in the Army and the longevity allowance was made. The Supreme Court held as a bare technicality that this statute giving longevity pay included time spent at West Point, and that cadets might have the benefit, as though in actual Army service, of the time they served there. Those who have received this pay for service at West Point have been allowed to do so because of a technicality. They had no real merit nor equity in their claims. They ought to have been ashamed to take the money.

And I say that there is no question of Union or Confederacy here now. I am surprised that gentlemen should talk about officers in the Union Army and Confederate officers. Gentlemen, that question is not involved in this bill. It has absolutely nothing to do with it. Confederate officers were enabled to present their claims by a statute removing the bar of Confederate service. They were in no way preferred over Union officers. The law merely placed both on an equality. That question is not in it and ought not to be brought into it.

Gentlemen ought not to get up here on the floor of the House and try to justify themselves in voting money out of the Public Treasury on the ground that it goes to Union officers. It is not proposed to give it to Volunteer officers. It is only for the fellows who had the benefit of West Point education at public expense. They have no merits in their claims, but stand upon a naked legal technicality. Against that technicality I match, for the consideration of the gentleman who stands on it the fact that such claimants had their day in court.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. They have had their day in court. Many wrongful decisions are made by the courts. They are made every day; it is a way courts have; but Congress does not undertake to do justice or correct them merely because the courts have erred. Public auditors make mistakes every day, and when the people to whom the claims are due, instead of taking their claims to the court, allow them to sleep throughout the long years, they ought not to undertake to come before Congress, standing, as I say, on naked legal technicalities. They should not come and ask us to rip up the decisions after long lapse of time and pay their claims when they stand on no real merit. Let us have done with such nonsense.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak not upon the bill but upon another matter in which I think the House is patriotically interested. It is in reference to a service flag to commemorate the men who have gone forth from the House and enlisted in the armed forces of the United States. Nearly every building in this country, nearly every home in this Nation, is to-day decorated by a flag which is placed there in honor of the sons and fathers who have enlisted in the service of the Republic. This House has to-day on its honor roll of valiant soldiers—brave men who have gone forth wearing the uniform of the United States—the lamented Gardner of Massachusetts, Mr. LAGUARDIA of New York, Mr. HEFNTZ of Ohio, and Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I believe that this body should be so patriotic, so appreciative, so earnest, that we, its Members, will decorate the Hall of this House with a flag commemorating these four brave men and those that may follow them to the front.

I have already offered a resolution, Mr. Chairman, that is now pending before the Committee on Accounts, authorizing the procurement of such a flag, and I sincerely hope that it will report that resolution favorably, and that this House will indorse the action of the Committee on Accounts should they report favorably the resolution. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, there is no merit in this bill. There is no justice in it. There is no equity in it; it has no legs on which to stand. The only argument which its most ardent advocates and friends have advanced is an appeal to the fellows in the South, because they got their part of the swag a couple of years ago without any legitimate right, and the fellows in the North, who were barred from their part of the longevity pay between 1890 and 1908, were barred by an adverse decision by a Comptroller of the Treasury. Now, that is the kind of argument, but it does not appeal to me at all.

The student who goes to the Military Academy is graduated at the public expense or cost of about $40,000 or $60,000—I speak advisedly—to the taxpayers of the country, and it does not appeal to me with very much force when he comes to Congress and asks that these old graveyard claims, dead by the statute of limitations a long time ago, be resurrected.

Now, it is not my purpose to slander any member of the Judiciary Committee at all—far from it; but if any man wants to find out whether or not there are attorneys in this matter, let him go down to the auditor's office in the War Department. Let him go down and find out, as I have done, the attorneys that are behind these cases that have been denied between 1890 and 1908.

As I said a moment ago, I am not accusing the Judiciary Committee of anything unjust or unfair, but I am here to say to this Committee of the Whole that if there ever was an attorney's case presented on the floor of this House that never would have come here without an attorney, you are looking one now square in the face and fairly between the eyes. [Laughter.] It is an attorney's case, and that is all there is to it.

Now, with some amendments I may possibly vote for this bill. When the time comes I am going to offer an amendment, possibly two or more, and I want to ask the friends of this bill, the men who are sincere and who believe that it ought to pass, what earthly objection there can be to an amendment incorporating in the bill a provision that only the officers' widows and their children shall be allowed this longevity pay. Is there anything wrong in that? Would that destroy the bill? If your purpose be to remunerate simply the officers, if your premises are sound that they ought to have it, then are you going to insist that where the officer is dead and his widow is dead, where he has no children of his own, his nephews and nieces and uncles and aunts and collateral kin shall come into the Court of Claims and receive a part of the officer's claim or that part left by the attorney?

Another amendment I shall offer at the proper time—and I am not clear on that point as to the power of Congress—but it is that no attorney or agent of any attorney or set of attorneys shall receive a compensation in excess of 10 per cent of the amount which may be allowed by the Court of Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. COX. I hope some of you gentlemen will take time to go down to the auditor's office in the War Department and find out the names of some of these attorneys that have these claims.

One of the men I am reliably informed was called before a very competent committee of this House the other day with relation to steamboat inspectors. Congress has been besieged for an increase in salary of steamboat inspectors, and I think the committee was favorable to granting the increase. I know a little something about the salary of steamboat inspectors, and I think they ought to be increased. But what was finally developed? It was finally developed that the leading attorney of the vast majority of these cases now pending in the War Department had a contract with the steamboat inspectors whereby he got 10 to 20 or 25 per cent of the first year's increase of salary in the event that the bill went through Congress. That is what you are up against here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Seven minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has arranged to yield his time and that there will be only one more speech on that side. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, my colleague on the committee, Mr. GRAHAM, asked to get time from the gentleman from North Carolina, but he was unable to do so. Of the seven minutes remaining I desire to yield four minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I shall occupy the four minutes, but I want to correct one or two things that were not made clear in the beginning. I wish to call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that the lists published in the report of our committee are lists of the claims paid, and, of course, they go back beyond the period that was the subject of this controversy or dispute. I ask the attention of my colleagues also to the report, Appendix 2, which shows the history of this subject from the Fifty-first Congress down to this time. Bills exactly like this have been passed by the Senate of the United States, I think three times—twice I am sure of—in the history of this legislation, but they failed to pass in the House, not because of an adverse report but because they were not reached in the exigencies of the legislative period. I wish also to call the attention of my colleagues to the fact apparent in the quotation which I made from the letter of the head of the War Department in the present administration, Mr. Baker, who said that these claims were just and that they ought to be paid, and recommended to the Committee on Military Affairs that a proper and suitable bill should be introduced for the purpose of paying them; so that there has not been, as was intimated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], any instance in which these claims were turned down, repudiated, or adversely reported upon. In every instance they were recognized as fair. I wish to say one word in answer to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox]. He said the only meritorious argument found was the appeal based on the fact that certain legislation had taken place which allowed the soldiers or graduates of West Point that went into the Confederacy to get their "share of the swag," as he called it. The reference to that instance was only made to show that there was a demand in fairness and justice that the rest of those who graduated from West Point ought to receive the same consideration. Again I call attention to the fact that the argument presented based upon the statute repealing longevity rights is no argument to use against the payment of these claims. Very many of us will join with the gentleman who spoke here when he said that the four years of service at West Point at the expense of the Government ought not to be counted. I shall go as far as the gentleman from Missouri in saying that that perhaps ought not to be done, but that is not the question before us in this bill. The question before us is whether or not we can afford to dishonestly discriminate between several classes of men, shutting one side out simply because of an unfortunate decision by a comptroller and allow all the rest to be paid. It is not for us to say now what the policy of the Government ought to have been. The policy of the Government was clearly established during all those years and included in the count of longevity the period of service at the academy at West Point.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said with reference to these claims, and the appeal has been made that we ought to pass this bill in order to do equity. Since these claims were filed the United States, through its Congress, has enacted legislation which shuts out men who to-day stand in the same situation as these men stood in at the time they presented their claims, and it is said that hereafter attendance at the Military Academy shall not accrue to their benefit in getting longevity pay. One reason why I submit that equity will not be done is because the men themselves will get no benefit from this legislation, and if you will examine the files you will ascertain that the claims are filed by administrators and by persons representing the estates of these gentlemen, who have long since passed away.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman know how many of these unpaid claims still remain?

Mr. WALSH. I do not; nor was there any information presented to the committee respecting it, nor do we know how much it will cost, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] admits that it will cost about a half million dollars. In these days, when we are appropriating by the billion, of course we can pass over very lightly a half-million dollar appropriation in order to be equitable and just, but up to about 1884 no one ever suspected that the period spent in the Military Academy was to be counted, and it was only because some shrewd and clever agent was able to present his claim in such a manner and get it before the Court of Claims and take it before the Supreme Court that this ruling was secured. But the Supreme Court only assumed to act and adjudicate it in so far as they assumed the Court of Claims had jurisdiction, and in following that this Comptroller of the Treasury based his ruling, namely, that the Supreme Court only assumed to determine the question raised in so far as it held the Court of Claims had jurisdiction, and the Court of Claims only had jurisdiction in that class of cases that was filed within six years.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. And so I say that, in order to be equitable, we better know not only what it will cost but the reason for the adjudication by the Comptroller of the Treasury. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. IGOE. Did not the gentleman, as a member of the committee, approve an equitable claim by the State of Massachusetts from this very committee for about $600,000 growing out of a Civil War claim in the last Congress?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I did; but it was not based upon any such flimsy pretext as is set up to do equity in this case, as the gentleman well knows; it related to a case where money had been paid by that State.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Was it not a question of getting interest on an old debt that had been carried for the Government?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, this matter has been so fully discussed that it is idle to try and offer anything new. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that no one disputes that this is a valid legal claim except so far as it may be affected by the statue of limitation. Outside of that there is no question about the propriety of it. We have paid a large number of like claims, claims standing on exactly the same footing, to the officers who joined the Confederate Army. Why, then, should we not do equal justice to the officers who served the Union during the Civil War? They say this is a technical claim. Now, is it technical? Is it any more technical than any other claim against the Government? There is a statute directing this payment. The Supreme Court has held that these officers are entitled to this pay. The Court of Claims has held the same thing. The Secretary of War says this is an honest claim and ought to be paid. It seems to me that all this discussion with reference to whether it was good policy to authorize this payment in the first instance has no real bearing upon this matter at all. That is past. The parties whom we are seeking to help are the parties who used diligence in collecting their claims from the Government. They can not be said to have slept upon their rights. They presented their claims in due course and their claims ought to have been allowed, as appear clearly by the decisions to which I have called attention.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not have the time.

Mr. KEATING. Just for one question. Has the gentleman read Comptroller Gilkeson's decision?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I read it a year or more ago, and do not remember.

Mr. KEATING. As a matter of fact, was not he merely barring those claims which were not presented within six years?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; as I understand it, he barred out all of these claims.

Mr. KEATING. No; those not presented within six years.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No matter what he did, it is perfectly apparent that the claim is just and valid under the law and that these officers have a right to it. We ought to do justice to these parties, and that is all that is asked in this case.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman to clarify that a little. I think it is a very important question which the gentleman from Colorado asked whether this comptroller from 1890 to 1908 disallowed only those claims which were not filed within six years.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not remember just what he held, but one thing is perfectly plain, the Secretary of War has passed upon this matter within very recent times. The Supreme Court has passed upon it and the Court of Claims has passed upon it, and they have all held that it is a fair and honest claim. It does not make any difference, it seems to me, what he did hold. He did refuse to allow the claim. It does not matter what reason he gave for his action.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Did he allow any claim during his administration? Were any of these claims allowed from 1890 to 1908?

Mr. KEATING. Comptroller Gilkeson did not overrule the Supreme Court's decision. On the contrary, he told his subordinates to follow that decision, but that the Supreme Court did not take jurisdiction except in so far as the Court of Claims had jurisdiction, and that the Court of Claims did not assume the jurisdiction of claims which were not filed within six years.

Mr. WEBB. I will ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Court of Claims shall have power to enter judgment upon the findings of fact heretofore made in claims of officers of the United States Army for longevity pay under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States v. Morton, volume 112, United States Reports, page 1; and United States v. Watson, volume 130, United States Reports, page 80; and of the Court of Claims in Stewart v. United States, volume 34, Court of Claims Reports, page 553.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. Will this be regarded as one section and the two paragraphs be read before any amendment can be offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that there are two paragraphs and that each paragraph should be treated separately.

Mr. COX. Then I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "Army," in line 5, page 1, the following: "Who are living, or their widows and children."

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I said a moment ago on this amendment about all I had to say, but I would like earnestly to ask the most ardent advocates of this bill what earthly objection can they possibly have to this amendment?

What is wrong? If you want to compensate the officer, if he is alive, my amendment will let you do it. If the officer himself is dead, but his widow is living, my amendment lets you compensate her. If the officer and his widow both be dead, and they have any children living, my amendment lets you compensate them. Now, if it is justice and equity you are after, gentlemen, and that is the whole theory on which you bottom every argument that has been presented by every man who has spoken in favor of this bill, I am presenting you in this little amendment a case of equity, pure and simple.

I appeal to you, gentlemen, from another viewpoint. We ought to be just with ourselves and with our constituents before we become generous. Has the time come that when we compensate the officer, or if he be dead, then his wife, or if she be dead, then his children, that justice would say we should stop there before we go to compensating collateral kin—nephews, nieces, uncles, and aunts, and so forth?

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman's amendment is written "widows and children." Should it not be "widows or children"?

Mr. COX. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. That should be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the word "and" will be changed to "or."

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. I do not believe, as I said a moment ago, that the most ardent advocates of this bill can afford to oppose this amendment. If there be any merit at all in the entire proposed bill, it is in compensating the officers themselves. It is a peculiar thing to me—at least, somewhat peculiar—that the ardent advocates of this bill certainly had it within their power to file and make a part of their report the number of these unpaid claims that are pending down here with the Auditor for the War Department and did not do it. If they had exercised a little care or a little diligence by going down there, I do not think there would have been very much trouble for them to have found out how many of these unpaid claims are still pending in the department. And I know, Mr. Chairman, it would not have been very much trouble for them to have found out these attorneys' hands that have been playing in these cases for, lo, these many years.

Now, I am not in favor of going beyond the payment of the officer, his widow, or his children. I am in favor of stopping right there. I am not in favor of paying these attorneys 50 or 75 per cent upon whatever claim may be allowed by the Court of Claims as of judgment against the United States.

Mr. ROBBINS. To what extent will your amendment affect the number of claims in this bill?

Mr. COX. I have no idea; but I have an idea it will affect it very materially.

I had no idea that any of these claims were out in my district. I have one claim in my district, in the extreme southern part of Indiana, 800 miles from here. Some attorneys who were diligent in looking after the welfare of the soldier—oh, yes—got up a claimant away out in my district—a forty-second cousin of a graduate of West Point.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. About a forty-second cousin of a graduate of West Point. And I speak almost authoritatively when I put that multiplication to it. Before I wrote the party that I refused to support this legislation I took some precaution to find out who the party was and who his ancestor was. The relationship between them was about in the fourth degree. I promptly wrote the party that I would not support the bill, that I would not support it or any other as unmeritorious a claim from my district.

To sum this whole matter up, as I said a while ago—and I am not slamming the Judiciary Committee at all—I wish to say that you are dealing here with an attorney's case. When you pass this bill you will put in the pockets of certain attorneys here in the city of Washington, who are diligent to the day of judgment, not less than $250,000. That is what you are going to do. With a war in which we are spending billions, is this a war measure? No. Shall we put it upon that ground and run our hands into the Treasury of the United States and take out of there $500,000, one-half to go to attorneys in this city? No.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I confess I was rather inclined from a sentimental viewpoint to favor the enactment of this law, but I have listened to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], and I concur in the view that he has presented to the House. If there be any right, it must lie in the allowance of the claim first to the man who served; and if he be dead, to his widow; and if she be dead, to their children. And I verily believe it ought not to go beyond that. If we go beyond that, we appropriate the money out of the Treasury for the payment of attorneys' fees in large measure. And I am opposed to the payment of money from the Treasury of the United States to men who have been lobbying for the enactment of a law for the payment of bills that have long since gone beyond the realm of legality under the law.

And so I say that if we want to do justice, if we want to do equity, if we want to be fair to ourselves and to the Treasury of the United States, we can afford to agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] and adopt the amendment which he has suggested, which does ample justice to everybody that ought to be concerned in the case.

Mr. ROWE. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman understand that this amendment applies to children, whether they be of age or not? Or does it apply to those under age?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, it applies to the children of the soldier and his widow. If neither the soldier nor his widow be left, it applies to the children, whether they are of age or under age.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ROWE. I have a case similar to that kind, where a man was a Civil War veteran, and he died and left three children. Two of those are dead now, but they left some little children.

In that event it would all go to one middle-aged woman and cut off those three children, his direct heirs.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana goes far enough. Of course, if you extend it to meet the case cited by my friend from New York you would have to extend it to meet the case of a nephew or a thirty-second cousin, or some other collateral heir, no matter how far distant, and there ought to be a line beyond which we will not go. The line has been drawn by this amendment, and it is just and fair and decent, not only to the claimants but to ourselves and to the people of the United States, for whom we speak. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, there is a special need why this amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] should pass and why his strictures about the attorneys' case are quite applicable. Nobody, of course, who knows the membership of the Committee on the Judiciary imagines that that is any reflection upon their consideration of this legislation or upon them; but I call the attention of the committee to the fact that this bill reads in its first line—

That the Court of Claims shall have power to enter judgment upon the findings of fact heretofore made.

Now mind: This whole bill is applicable only to a narrow class of cases, those where findings of fact have heretofore been made by the Court of Claims. So all of this argument about this bill not discriminating against anybody falls to the ground. This very bill is going to discriminate against everybody except those whose findings of fact have heretofore been made. Now, those findings of fact have heretofore been made only upon the claims of those who have employed attorneys to present their cases to the Court of Claims. That is just as plain as sunlight. During the 18 years in which this ruling was in force, from 1890 to 1908, when it was being held by the Comptroller of the Treasury that only such claims as the Court of Claims had taken jurisdiction of and the Supreme Court had affirmed would pass the muster of the Treasury, doubtless there were many other claims that did not pass muster, but they are not included here. However meritorious those officers may have been, they did not get in during that period, they did not get their claims before the Court of Claims, and they did not employ any attorney, and therefore they are not in this bill, because this bill says that only those whose findings of fact have heretofore been made shall have any advantage from this bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BORLAND. In just a minute. It gives the court power to enter judgment in cases where the findings of fact have heretofore been made, and that confines it to the class of cases that some attorney has already had charge of.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. You say that is discriminatory. Have not all the others been paid?

Mr. BORLAND. No.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I say they have been.

Mr. BORLAND. It is perfectly manifest from the information that was given about Comptroller Gilkeson's decision that what he did was that he ordered the auditor to allow all claims of which the court had taken jurisdiction, which included all claims filed within six years, and not to allow the claims of which the court had not taken jurisdiction; and that decision clearly indicates that there were some claims that fell outside his ruling. That is perfectly evident to me, and it must be perfectly evident to every lawyer in this body. There must have been certain cases that fell outside of that ruling. The cases that come under this bill are the cases where some attorney has taken the claims and presented them to the Court of Claims and secured findings of fact, and those findings of fact are now before this body.

Now, that being the case, it is specially necessary that this amendment be passed concerning this payment, not to the estate generally of the claimant or to his collateral heirs, but to the claimant himself and to those dependent upon him, his widow and children. I purpose to follow this by an amendment limiting to 10 per cent the amount that any attorney can be paid of any one of these claims. Now, I do not feel authorized to present my amendment unless if adopted I would vote for the bill, and I assume that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] takes the same position. It seems to me that if we present these amendments and the House agrees to them, we are in some measure bound to support the bill, whatever might be our general view about the equities of it. But it does seem to me that these two propositions are absolutely essential in order that this House and the Treasury shall not be imposed upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, with respect to the amendment that has been offered I wish to say that in my judgment it is not founded in right. Either these men have a claim that is established and just or they have not. If this Congress were making a gift to these men, that would be one question. But if we are simply correcting an error committed by an officer of the Government, that excluded their claims from consideration unrighteously, you have no right to debar any of the persons who would be interested in the estate of a deceased soldier from participation in a legal and just claim. You are not granting these men a favor; you are granting them a right. All who preceded were paid; all who came afterwards were paid; and this list of men were just as much entitled to their money and to have it devolve according to law as any of those who received their money, and to put this limitation on it is not to act in accordance with the spirit of justice. Besides, I understand the gentleman from Illinois adopted the interpretation of this amendment that if there were grandchildren of these soldiers they could not inherit. What right have you to deny to the blood of the men who earned and deserved this compensation that their relatives in that degree at least shall participate in the distribution of whatever money is recovered? [Applause.]

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. As a matter of law, would not the grandchildren inherit under this bill from those who are entitled to it as children?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; not if you limit it in this bill. I am sorry to say it would limit it to soldiers who are living and their widows or children.

Mr. DOWELL. But it does not limit it to living children, and if it went to the children by inheritance it would then go to the grandchildren.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Not unless they had a vested interest.

Mr. DOWELL. Would not that be true in case of a will?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is a different matter. That is different from the interpretation of a statute which recognizes the right solely upon the theory that it shall go to the widow or children. Children are a well-designated, specified class. The comptroller could only consider the claim when presented by the persons named in the act.

Mr. DOWELL. But if this is a claim which has been established, and is now a part of the estate, is it not true that the grandchildren would take the part that belonged to the child as a mater of law?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Here is the difficulty. There is no method of enforcing the claim except by virtue of the power granted in this act of Congress to the comptroller to review the decision of a previous comptroller, or to the Court of Claims to enter judgment upon a state of facts already proved before them, and no award could be made to anyone outside of those specifically named in the act.

Mr. SANFORD. That might apply after the passage of this act.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; that might apply after the passage of this act with a vested right. Then I think the gentleman's theory of the law might possibly be applicable, but until then it would not prevail.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Here are some claims the payment of which is sought after many times and many years of refusal by Congress in time of peace, when there was a full Treasury to pay the same. Now, what is the condition of the country? In the first place, by voluntary contributions by the hundreds of millions, to the Red Cross, to the Young Men's Christian Association, to the Knights of Columbus, everywhere, men and women, North and South, are called upon, outside of taxation, from the standpoint of patriotism, to help the present in the great contest for the future. There are claims enough against the Government—some of them perchance with equity, most of them without equity, nearly all of them barred by the statute of limitation—to patch hell a mile. [Laughter and applause.] We passed on yesterday a second deficiency bill for over a billion dollars for the present year, and, as I recollect, a further deficiency, after extraordinary appropriations made on recommendations of the committee having jurisdiction, of over $2,000,000,000.

We are financing our allies by the multiplied billions. We are taxing ourselves and our constituents world without end. We are supporting the Army in its preparation for its service abroad and building a Navy by the billions of dollars. And yet here comes this claim that in God's chancery never ought to have been allowed or authorized. [Applause.] They say that it is confined to the graduates of West Point. I think it is broader than that, as I explained before. With that which we have at the present time for voluntary donation, when you consider all the industries to win this war and all the organizations to enable us to win it, when you consider that we have already run two liberty loans and another coming to double both of them, with another revenue bill in sight, let us deal with the present instead of hatching up claims of doubtful character and beginning to vitalize them.

If it be in order, Mr. Chairman, when this amendment is disposed of, I will move to strike out the enacting clause. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the proposed motion of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the enacting clause now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that it is in order at any time.

Mr. CANNON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. WEBB. But, Mr. Chairman, the bill has not yet been read under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair stated, the motion is in order at any time, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 54, noes 28.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1691) to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment striking out the enacting clause.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The question was taken.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of no quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUDDLESTON) there were—ayes 33, noes 53.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois for the previous question, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 261, nays 51, answered "present" 4, not voting 112, as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 21, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we call upon Thee from day to day as we come to face the solemn responsibilities of this place and hour. We would gain a deep appreciation of those rights and obligations that lie deeper than human government, deeper than all that we have control of in life. We pray Thee to give us spiritual vision to know the things that pertain to life eternal, that we may have constantly in view the everlasting kingdom of God. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the National Academy of Sciences for the year ended December 31, 1917, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriations in the sum of $150,000 required by the Bureau of Mines for investigations concerning minerals needed for war purposes for the fiscal year 1918 (S. Doc. No. 178), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Postmaster General submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $1,185,000 required by the Postal Service for the fiscal year 1918 for the manufacture of stamps, stamped envelopes, stationery, etc., payable from postal revenues (S. Doc. No. 177), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 70) authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of James Buchanan, a former President of the United States, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 350,000 copies of the war excess-profits tax regulations No. 41, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 350,000 copies of the income-tax regulations No. 33, revised, etc., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order. [A pause.] If there are none, reports of committees. [A pause.] Introduction of bills. [A pause.] Concurrent or other resolutions. [A pause.] The morning business is closed.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3752, the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I take it that my observations in the general debate of this railroad bill will practically close the general debate and we will soon be remitted to the 10-minute rule and to the amendments. I trust I may not occupy the Senate unnecessarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has three hours. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. I thank you, sir. There are times when I would be very envious of that privilege. To-day I am not anxious to avail myself of it, and I fear the Senate is not particularly hopeful that I should occupy it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield for the purpose of the suggestion, holding my place if I can. I do not want to lose my right to the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, this railroad bill, so called, has very many interesting features, and, with great respect to the debate and paying a due tribute to the eminent men who have participated in a most effective manner in that debate, I feel that some phases directly connected with the bill have been omitted in the consideration. Or if they have been contemplated in the consideration they have not been expressed in the debate. It is likely that my entrance at this hour in the debate means that my speech is the closing of the general debate.

Mr. President, the chairman of this committee, the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], has given a ceaseless energy, constant labor, and unflagging perseverance to this work of getting out this bill from the committee and supporting and maintaining it on the floor. It is but justice to say to the chairman and of him that if the State of South Carolina ever fails in appreciation of his great efforts from time to time on this floor in conservation of its cotton interests, it should certainly turn with commendable pride and constant admiration for the distinctive effort he has brought to bear in support of this great administration measure

Mr. President, there is another feature I can not overlook nor fail to advert to. The debate on this bill from the Senators who have contributed to it has disclosed an amount of information and learning that would have been a credit to any set of men in any body, legislative or judicial. The amount of industry and sincerity, the complete divorcement of partisan attitude, the utter denial to indulge in any political prospective for themselves, has been so apparent that when this whole matter is concluded justice will accord to this debate a verdict of impartiality and fairness and a contribution of learning that has not been excelled by any other, sir, that has preceded it, certainly in this administration.

Mr. President, I see the purposes of this bill, however, in a little different light than has been proposed, at least observed upon, by these eminent Senators who have addressed themselves to the measure. The bill has for its ostensible object the lending of money to railroads upon their roads, their property, and their earnings as a security. The object is, of course, to enable the roads to conduct their business, and particularly to provide for that $790,000,000 that is now due upon securities of different roads of the country, where there is no money to meet it, and to avoid the distress and embarrassment that will follow from the inability to meet the obligations.

Mr. President, I heard the eminent Senator from Iowa, the senior Senator [Mr. CUMMINS], in his very full presentation of the objections he has to this measure, and wherein and however I may differ from the senior Senator from Iowa in many things, and possibly in many views on this bill, it is but the expression of justice to say that in railroad matters, in railroad legislation, there is no more informed man in public life.

The eminent Senator from Minnesota, the junior [Mr. KELLOGG], who differed to a great degree from the senior Senator from Iowa, however, excluded from personal experience in legislation of railroads, must be accorded that tribute which comes from a very vast experience in the litigation in the legal questions which arise growing out of the legislation touching railroads. So from both these sources much information rightfully is gleaned.

Mr. President, I am compelled of my own choice to pass by many of the features of this bill which I do not feel at all necessary to consider in order to justify my support of the measure.

We have been lending to foreign governments money that will soon reach in its total $10,000,000,000. We are lending this money only upon their bonds. These bonds, sir, are issued from governments over which we have no control. The security for which these bonds issue we have no government of. We have no method by which we can protect ourselves in the administering of these governments, in the conserving of our securities, in the guardianship of the property. Yet we issued this vast sum of money in perfect confidence that it is a safe investment, stimulated by the highest patriotism, and to be rewarded ultimately by a return of the full face of the security here in our own country.

These roads to which we are about to advance the money are all in the United States. The property will soon be under our own supervision, the roads under our own control, the management under our own direction. We are enabled to conserve this property, guard its finances, and secure ourselves.

At the very outset, the mere statement of this parallel would suggest that the investment to the railroad is really a much more secure, stable, and finally a more reliable one than that which we are indulging in behalf of these foreign governments.

Mr. President, I may shock those who may know me with some intimacy when I wish it understood that I view this bill as the beginning of the Government ownership of the railroads. More than that, sir, from my viewpoint this bill initiates the policy of this Government into the ownership not only of the railroads but into that era of the ownership of the telegraph and the telephone in America, to be followed by the ownership or the control of the agencies of fuel, those natural agencies—coal and oil—and all that, in order that this Government may no longer and never in the hereafter be paralyzed in its necessary governmental undertakings because of the monopoly of private ownership of those public utilities essential to the public welfare of the Republic.

Mr. President, I know there are many objections to entering by this Government upon what may be called the general policy of a Government ownership of the transportation lines, as well as of other essential agencies to the public welfare.

There is now, and will remain, an honest school of difference between that which urges upon the Government the taking over of all of these agencies as necessary to the welfare and uses of the Government and that other school that demands for private enterprise full and unhampered opportunity for the exercise of its industry, the indulgence of its genius, and the benefit of its superior competition. In those two ideas there will ever be a conflict, and there is no man living to-day, nor will his children who shall come after him, ever see the end of it. It has been a question in all forms of government since government was devised.

It may interest my fellow Senators who do me the kindness to hear me to know that in the administration of Ming, 850 years before the birth of Christ, in the Government of China, the doctrine of socialism and that of the policy of the Government owning and controlling the roadways over which vehicles in the form of baskets, conducted upon the shoulders of men, were to be controlled, as against the policy of the companies, known as the Chinese companies, which then owned these methods of conveyance and use of transportation for the benefit of those who bought the privilege of this particular monopoly from the Government in which they existed for a certain sum of money; and afterwards, of course, extracted from the patrons such very large sum as they could as their profit of the undertaking.

Mr. President, it may amuse you to know that in the little Government of Iceland long years ago when it attempted a republic, which did not last very long as against the hordes which swept down from the north upon the country—that then ended it—that the first advent on the part of this little land, bounded with its barriers of snow and ice, was to control the first muniment of personal welfare, the egress and ingress of its people to and from markets and ports to their homes. That this little republic would have inaugurated for the very first government of Europe that system but for the force of spear and sword and the invasion of armies none of us now can deny.

But to indicate how little there is really new and how truly is the prophecy of Isaiah fulfilled, when the early Republic of Judea was established, one of the very first invocations that was sent to it from their spiritual masters was the demand that it promptly possess itself of the roads in order that no military companies from the outside be permitted to transport themselves across the land of this young Judea without the consent of its government, nor that its own people be allowed to use it without compensation to their own government. This control, having for its object the national defense, was based upon the theory that if private management or private control should ever possess the roads there would be no way to prevent the foreign enemy from being permitted to use the roads for their hordes of assault in exchange and barter, having paid for the privilege, and they might find their land invaded by men occupying their roads in turn for having bought them from those who privately assumed to sell them.

So we may not flatter ourselves that these are original thoughts in government. My eminent colleague the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday alluded, in a speech filled with acidulous drippings, to the fact that he could remember how these issues of Government ownership of roads were heard throughout Illinois in the seventies and in the eighties. I can assure my esteemed colleague that long indeed before Illinois was born they were heard in their different form and echo throughout different avenues of the earth.

But, Mr. President, the objections urged to Government ownership are, of course, in our Government particularly pertinent. We are presumed to have founded a Government on the theory of individualism, and to that extent, of course, it is a serious question whether these views suggested by me are in harmony with it.

But I wish to put my advocacy of this measure on the ground of national defense. I wish now to state to the Senate that the time has come when this Government must look squarely in the face the problems which confront it. This Government must take possession of these roads under this proposed law, or under any other law, not so much as a commercial necessity but as a necessary national preservative.

Mr. President, has it ever struck your mind (and, brother Senators, I ask your attention to the thought) that to-day there is not a road owned by this Government in the whole United States that can transport your soldiers from sea to sea for the defense of your shores? Do you fancy that the necessity is not now upon you? Senators, have you observed that here, when we attempted to defend ourselves against a foreign foe, we have been unable, in the system of transportation now prevailing, to send our soldiers to the coast, where they were to embark upon vessels to be landed upon foreign shores, because of the lack of continuous transportation, and because of the confusion of the railroads, the complications of their systems, and their failures to serve? What do you think would have been the result if an enemy were at your door possessing your coasts? What, then, do you think would have been the consequence to your Government in its efforts to transport its soldiers, to land its supplies, and be prepared to defend itself at its Pacific doors or on the Atlantic?

Mr. KELLOGG rose.

Mr. LEWIS. I fancy the Senator from Minnesota desires to interrupt me. Does he desire to do so?

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois a question.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, did I correctly understand the Senator from Illinois to say that the railroads had failed to transport troops promptly?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. The word "promptly," I may say to the Senator, is a very elastic one.

Mr. KELLOGG. To transport them efficiently and promptly?

Mr. LEWIS. So is the word "efficiently" an elastic one. However, I say this, that in the attempt to transport the troops the roads were so congested that the cars could not be had. Since the Senator invites me to it, I regret to state that the soldiers were cramped. They were placed in accommodations which I deplore to say cattle would not have been put in. That was out of a forced condition on the part of the railroads. They did not have the equipment, and the conditions were such, I answer the Senator, that far from being transported promptly and efficiently, they were unfortunately most barbarously transported.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Secretary of War reported that the soldiers were transported promptly and efficiently, and praised the transportation in the highest terms.

Mr. LEWIS. I must say to the Senator that the conclusion of the Secretary of War was that "under the conditions," and it is those conditions which I ask to have removed. I must say to the eminent Senator that under the conditions we must admit that the roads probably could have done no better, and we must be just and say they did the best they could, but it is those conditions, which I feel laid such a burden upon this Government and placed us at such disadvantage that I wish to change.

I have also the other reason to which I was alluding and reaching when the eminent Senator from Minnesota interpolated his suggestion. Mr. President, I regard this Nation in this hour confronting a very serious danger to which our fellow citizens seem blind or indifferent. Notwithstanding the generosity and benefactions of this Nation to Russia, the vast millions we gave it to rehabilitate and restore it, its people seem unconscious either of the debt of appreciation or of gratitude. The attitude of mind of Russia is one of opposition to us, and that without regard to anything we have done. I deplore to say that it is my opinion that this attitude of antagonism will multiply and will continue, for to the Russian mind there is a basic reason: First, they have been educated to the belief that this United States failed in its obligation of gratitude to Russia. They point to the fact that we lent our aid, as they charge, to Japan, through the influence of Britain, in the war between Russia and Japan. Russia holds a deep sense of antipathy, if not vengeance, against us for that. Her humble people, her farmers, the moujiks, have been educated to hold us in prejudice, for that, it is said, we "put the Jew money lender upon them and stationed him upon every corner where their farms produce." That slander, we know, has no foundation. That falsehood, we know, is without justification, even in any form of governmental fact. We did demand of Russia that she give to the Jew the same fair treatment as a citizen that any other American citizen traveling in her land should have, but it is sufficient to say that our enemies, whether they come from Prussia or any other land, have fanned that prejudice to where to-day it burns like a flame in Russia.

Mr. President, Russia will not decline, as I see it, to gratify upon us any form of resentment she ever can enforce. I do not indulge the dream that is enjoyed by many gentlemen in this land that we have anything to expect in the way of reciprocal military friendship from Russia. To the contrary, I now warn my country, as far as my impotent voice can reach, that if Prussia shall succeed in the movement she is now making toward the appropriation of Russia and secure power in Russia such as she hopes to administer, her very first inducement on Russia will be to advise Russia, "There is Alaska."

She will point to Russia that Alaska is yonder in the far north seas, so far as we are concerned, in the far northwestern waters; that there are the Aleutian Islands; that this land was wrested from them by America in diplomacy of the United States and, as alleged, "for a song." It will be cried out that Alaska possesses enough gold and minerals to enrich them from one end of their land to the other. That it was always theirs and was filched from them by us. Everything will be urged to awaken cupidity or vengeance and demand to wrest Alaska will be made by Prussia.

Alaska, divided from us by water, remote from us in its connection, difficult of approach, more difficult of defense, presents to us, to my thinking, at this hour the very serious problem of the day, because when Prussia will have animated this Russia, that is not now friendly to us at all, to move up toward Alaska and possess it, how shall we defend it? Russia, stimulated by Germany, could seize Alaska from the north, and we would have difficulty to reach it. We are engaged against Germany in Europe. In what manner would we move to the defense of this possession?

Mr. President, we are now building a railroad in Alaska as a Government railroad. The object, among other things, was to bring forth the stored riches of Alaska, but principally, I must assume, in order that we might defend Alaska; that we might have a method by which we could reach our ships at the shores of Alaska. If, sir, we do not have a Government road that reaches from sea to sea, that we may make an immediate connection whenever possible, wherever possible, and wherever necessary with the Government railroad of Alaska, by which we can transport troops across our own land, supplies across our own land, and then across Alaska in preference to any form of commodity of private persons whomsoever at any time, what possible agency of defense have we against that hour which I, sir, regretfully prophesy is ahead of us? With this bill passed it will at least initiate at once a system in the hands of the Government and enable us to prepare a defense for the evil which my eyes behold is at your door.

If the eminent Senators sitting about me answer that they can see no reason why this assault on Alaska should be made, then I will advert their minds, if they will permit me, to a military reason. What wiser policy than to have Germany stimulate Russia to seize Alaska, so as to compel us to divide our forces to the great North, to defend it, and thus disrupt them from the organization that is necessary now to be in the Atlantic to war against Germany in Europe? Then, Mr. President, keep in mind that that is but the beginning of what I see to be the problems of my country in our national peril.

Senators, we will live—God please to grant us our divine statute of limitations—to have to fight for Hawaii; and if we have any possessions in the Philippines—for the Philippines—all this to prevent those islands from being wrested from us by a power that will open its warfare through some form of antagonism—which need not now be anticipated in detail—against the United States.

If there be no railroad owned by this Government that can be used constantly to transport the troops to the edge of the Pacific to prepare us in our defense, to meet our vessels, and enable us to prepare in Hawaii, or in those possessions of the Pacific, the want of such defense will be quickly observed by those whose purposes and advantages will be served by assailing us, and we will find ourselves again powerless. For the protection of these possessions on the Pacific coast it is necessary that we have a Government railroad that shall be used and appropriated for the national defense of those possessions and for the safety of our Pacific coast against assaults which my mind, which my vision, beholds in the not too far distant future approaching upon us.

Mr. President, I can not conclude this suggestion without inviting your attention to the fact that we now control Porto Rico and the Virgin Islands. We have some friendship toward Cuba and a relation of amity. When the conflict comes upon us from any source—whether it should come now through Germany or in the future from a foreign foe upon the Atlantic or upon the Pacific—mark you, sir, these possessions in Atlantic waters will be easily the prey of any foreign foe assailing us. Therefore you must see clearly, sir, that if my argument is well taken as to the necessary defense of the Pacific, it is equally true as to the Atlantic, and that we need a road from the Pacific to the Atlantic as a Government property which can be taken, possessed, and utilized at any hour by the Government to transport to the Atlantic all essentials of defense, whether they be supplies or men, that these possessions, sir, in the Atlantic may be properly defended and supplied by our ships and our railroads.

Have we such a position now? No. Are we prepared now? No. Why? Because, as Senators on both sides of this Chamber have pointed out, our country never could be aroused to her dangers; and she will now, in her editorial columns throughout many places in this Nation, criticize me with great freedom, I dare say, and some bitterness, because I have assumed to point out at this critical time these increased burdens which I see are destined to come upon my Nation.

Mr. President, because I see, sir, the necessity of Government roads for the national defense, I justify this bill, indorse the purposes of the bill, and accept the objects of the bill. To the purpose of my support I concede every objection urged by the eminent Senators who have so faithfully considered the measure. I admit every one of them to the full extent to which they have been propounded; and I still reply that with all of the evils proposed by these eminent leaders they are small and insignificant compared to the benefits that will arise to the Government out of the protection, guaranty, and security which would come to use from these Government-operated roads in the manner that we are now taking them and in the method that we will continue to control them.

Mr. President, then, in conclusion of this feature, I tender the illustration:

Sir, it took Britain, with her divided situation, nearly two years, as we know, to make and land her armies. We know the trouble that was put upon France, with her more or less hybrid condition of private ownership of part of the roads and Government ownership of others. But when it came to Prussia, will Senators overlook how quickly Prussia, with her system of Government-owned roads, was enabled to mass her men at any point in all Prussia, and deprive all private merchandise, all private enterprise, of the privilege of the utilization of the roads? Being her own property, she was in no wise called upon to do as we had to do—summon the proprietors, negotiate a week, and reach a doubtful conclusion, leaving it subject to explosion, open to any form of construction, and finally a result to our embarrassment No! She took her own, placed her people upon it, and landed them in 11 days fully equipped, marshaled from helmet to sandal, and placed them upon the border of France, and was enabled by this mobilization to threaten the liberties of the world, so powerful was the concentration she was enabled to effect.

We may, sir, shrink from ever emulating the example of Prussia in her military establishments, in their assaults upon civil government, her blows against the freedom of man, or her attacks upon liberty of nations; but we surely will not blind our eyes with a bandage of ignorance and close them with indifference to this scene of complete efficiency when it came to defending her people or to preparing to advance against those she charged to the world were advancing upon her.

Then, I would have eminent Senators understand that while I respect their opposition, and in some instances their opposition is well founded to many features of the bill from their premises, I insist, sir, that this measure should pass with a unanimous vote for the uses it will give us in our national defense and the preparation against those dangers which any reflective man must see can be on their way against us.

Mr. President, many measures, sir, have in them a vital life that is not seen at the mere appearance, and they serve purposes which even their very authors at the time could not recognize.

Mr. President, in your casual reading I am sure you have run across the celebrated treatise of Guizot upon the Civilization of Europe. Archibald Alison, the great essayist of Scotland—writing from Postlehouse, his private home, in 1841—descants upon the splendid work of Guizot; and, among other things Alison has to say in the form of criticism, is that the work is destined to lay down precedents for the guidance of governments not yet born, and for the direction of men in things which Guizot himself did not understand.

Sir, there is before you an eminent Senator, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who does me the compliment of his attention, who, I am sure, has had his attention and has had his mind drawn to the matter to which I now will advert.

In Morley's Reminiscences, in that very interesting book, he proceeds to advert to the literary character of the men he has known who held high places in statecraft; and among other things, Count Morley calls the attention of Britain to how true it is that this interesting adversion of Alison on Guizot and his history of the civilization of Europe has come to pass; that a form of government has come upon Europe which, while Guizot anticipated it as a thing that should be, he never lived to see.

It had no relation whatever to the thing of which he was writing, and he justifies Alison in his then prophecy that a form of relief to mankind would follow from the things set forth in Guizot, but they would come in another government and in another era than that to which Guizot referred in his splendid disquisition.

Mr. President, might I make an application of these observations to this bill? I probably shall not be living—in the nature of Heaven's disposition of us all—it can not be possible that any of us can exist to see the end of the new era that is now upon us; but you will see, learned Senators, that you have now begun, by this piece of legislation, a new era in the formation of this Government, and have inaugurated a policy for those who are not now living, leading to purposes that were never in the mind of the framer of the bill; to objects that are not in the mind of the eminent Senators who discuss this bill from their hearts in sincerity, but which I do respectfully urge are necessary to the welfare of this Republic.

Senators, hear me propound that which in my land—the South—where I was born, will be treated as a heresy, and for which I dare say I will not soon be forgiven.

This Government has reached an end of its yesterdays. There is now no excuse whatever for a sovereign State government. There is now no governmental reason which can be advanced in the mind of a thinking, reflective man for that organization called the sovereignty of a State. We have grown so close as a Union that we have become in the United States a state of Government; and, Mr. President, you will see in the changes of this Government a result that will bring us to but two forms of sovereignty in government. The municipality, with regulations for its people at its doors through its own local charter; and, then, the national legislation for the government of the country at large. This railroad bill, sir, in its execution, will hasten this sure transformation, establishing the Nation as a union of service to the people and a Republic of national defense, unhampered by divided powers contented for by certain States, that is coming upon this Government.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. May I not inquire of the Senator from Illinois if the same reasons will not always exist for the States' existence that existed at the time the States were created?

As I recall, some of our most friendly critics, at the time of the formation of this Government, predicted that because of the vast area of our country—and it is much more vast now, probably three times greater in area than it was at the time of its formation—because of the necessary differences in climatic conditions, because of the differences in the habitudes and necessities of the people, because of the great mountain ranges and other physical divisions which appeared to cut this continent up into territory that would naturally be under different sovereignties, this Republic could not endure.

But the answer was made at the time that all these local things—these questions of ministering to the wants of the people of Texas, which were not the same as those of the people of Maine, or the wants of the people of Florida, which were not the same as those of the people of California—being committed to the States, which could locally govern within their boundaries, that constituted the cohesive bond that was going to hold this country together practically perpetually.

I ask the learned Senator from Illinois if those reasons are not as great to-day as they were at the time they induced the formation of the Government upon its present basis?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, any inquiry from the junior Senator from Pennsylvania is not only pertinent, but we who know his character and information respond to it with the consciousness that it is always important. This much, sir, must be conceded in his premises: There were those at the early foundation of the Government who despaired that the Republic could exist in the form of separate sovereignties. They were very far apart, and, as the Senator says, it was charged that they were very discordant and diversified, indeed, conflicting in their interests. True, there were those who insisted that some of those localities were not fit to exist as States. Mr. Webster, for instance, could not see the great western prairie except as a land to be abhorred, not as one to be cultivated and to exist in the form of States.

I say to the Senator, I think the reasons do exist. I say to him he is accurate, and the spirit in which he speaks is one that ought to be preserved, from my conviction; but I am compelled to point out to him the movements of the time, and to remind him that from the day of which he speaks up to some years ago the Supreme Court of the United States, the final arbiter in all these matters of conflict, recognized those sovereignties as having some existence of government, and recognized them as being able to protect their own diversified interests, and allowed them within their own gates to administer their own affairs unhampered from the Federal Government or from the outside—that is, from other States. But I must remind the eminent Senator that in the latter years the Supreme Court of the United States has denied any State of the Union, in reference to transportation or any other subject matter that is indulged across its State lines, a sovereignty of government, and has practically left the State a mere province of the Federal Government in which the Federal laws are to be administered.

May I remind the Senator, eminent lawyer as he is, and once Attorney General of this country, to the pride of the profession, that the Supreme Court of the United States has only lately held that even in the case of a railroad within a State, because it has lines that make connection with roads outside of the State, the local regulation of that local institution is void when it runs counter to something that the Interstate Commerce Commission has held upon a similar subject, for that it related in the nature of things to the disposition of that which did cross State lines and was connected with other States.

Mr. KNOX. But, if the Senator will permit me again——

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I quite agree that in certain directions the tendency toward centralization has gone so far that there is practically not a shred left of State authority. Of course it is well known that under the commerce clause of the Constitution this great progress has been made, and I am willing to concede that in dealing with the transportation interests of the country they have at last become absolutely centralized. But the point that I desired to make a moment ago was this:

I wanted to challenge the statement of the Senator from Illinois, as I understood it—and I think I am correct—that there no longer exist reasons for the States; that we have at last gotten into a condition where there is no legitimate reason why the whole of the Government of the American people should not be centered in the United States.

I called the Senator's attention to the reason why the States were created. I called his attention to the fact that there must be some localized government to deal with purely local interests; and in my judgment those reasons are greater to-day than they were when they impelled the fathers to create this Government upon its present model. If the Senator from Illinois is willing to do so, I should like to have him state more at length why he thinks there is no reason for the existence of the States.

I can imagine, Mr. President, that the time may come in this country when the American people will be convinced that there may be reason for resorting to arms to preserve the States, as there was at one time to preserve the Union. I regard the maintenance of the function of the States as that function has been exercised, and for which they were created, as being as important as any other institution of our Government.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I would that there were more students of government such as the eminent junior Senator from Pennsylvania, and I would, sir, that there were others who had his conviction and would execute that conviction in high places. I agree with the Senator there has been a school, a political school of mind, sir, for which I have fought, but I am compelled to say again, sir, that those in power in this Government have left us now little reason for the continuation of a sovereign thing, or a thing called sovereign, which we term a State.

It may be, sir, that, as the eminent Senator says, wisdom will come back to us, justice return, and that these localities will be treated again as having a governmental existence justified in themselves and worthy to be defended.

I remember in the celebrated case of White against Texas—Seventh Wallace, I think it was—the Supreme Court of the United States, in making a splendid definition of it, referred to them as indissoluble agencies, and referred to them as sovereign States of the indissoluble Union. But we can not overlook the fact that since then, in nearly everything that the State government has assumed to do that could be said to be sovereign in character, the Federal Government, in some form or another, has so ignored it as to leave the States, as I have remarked, without a reason for their professed sovereign existence; and I was pointing out, as the eminent Senator will recall, how the trend of the times was repealing the State.

Let me go further, sir—it may shock you, knowing, as I do know, the eminent Senator's regard for the Constitution—likewise the trend of the time and events seems to me to be repealing the United States Constitution. It is a new era to which I am alluding setting upon us. It mostly calls for a new constitution.

Now, I want to meet a proposition of the eminent Senator from Pennsylvania, which, I think, is most worthy of thought, and that is that there must be some form of government, local of character, to administer to those particular needs local of nature. I remind the eminent Senator, as I do the Senate, that when the fathers laid the foundation of this Government and gave to the States a sovereign character of government, to which he alludes, many of them then and for years after had not the population or government of many of our small cities. To-day, I may say to the eminent Senator, our form of government has changed. Instead of going to the legislatures of the States for incorporation acts to incorporate a city or to have a street railroad or a corporation, so termed, incorporated, nowadays a charter is voted by the people themselves in the different municipalities, and whatever power they wish to take to themselves they do it by their own voice—by their own vote.

Therefore, I say to the able Senator, my vision as I see things, however much I may fear its consequences, is that the local government that will now take the place the State formerly held as to local institutions, or personal government, which has been so usurped by Federal rulings, Federal policy, and Federal extension, will be the municipality. It will serve in a local sovereign character through its own charter, a private or local government necessary to the welfare of the citizens in all local matters in which the citizen in his home is concerned.

That seems to me to be the trend of the future and looks to me now the end to which things are tending.

Mr. President, I appreciate the interruption of the eminent Senator, because it is a very interesting question. I did not intend to get so far afield. I certainly did not will to take so much time; but I thank the Senator for letting me make more clear my views, lest it might be misunderstood if left without explanation, without the general discussion that has followed through the appropriate interrogation.

Mr. President, let me address myself for one or two moments to some opposition to this bill. The eminent Senator from Iowa, the senior Senator [Mr. CUMMINS], has pointed out at very great length, and I personally witnessed the amount of industry—the assiduous industry—the tireless energy that he brought to bear in the investigation of some figures which he presented here to the Senate. The Senator says that the property of these roads, together with their earnings, disclose very clearly that we are not getting a security for the amount of money we are advancing; to the contrary, that much property is being put upon them that is worthless and much money we are giving to roads which have behind them, and will have, no security as gathered from the reports of their earnings.

The very thorough senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], fortifying this viewpoint, likewise presented tables of his own to justify this form of objection.

I think, Mr. President, much must be said in favor of it; that it may be true that the disclosures of the road show that in many instances there is not a property earning that has now so much space and paper value as full security for the money we are advancing. But I ask all these Senators to hearken to the speech of the Senator from California, the junior Senator [Mr. JOHNSON], and ask them if they will not agree with him that that condition is largely due to the way those roads were managed, to the great expenses which are piled up, to use the figure of the Senator which I regard capable for them, piled mountain high, the excessive salaries they pay, many useless appendages which took a form of title and assumed a social superiority in the places where they live, and domination of legislators and purchase of judges, a form of extravagant outlay, vicious and corrupt expenditures, indulgences of a nature that need not be described at this time, but which in their saturnalia were vicious and nothing less than criminal.

I take it, eminent Senators, that with these things cut away, cicatrized, with these things dissected, removed, the Government coming into the management, these expenditures will be so eliminated that the earnings of the roads will rapidly rise to the point where the eminent Senator's objection to this bill on that ground would be no longer applicable.

But I am compelled to say to Senators if the objection is well taken, and as I think in some instances by comparison clearly it was, should they view the bill only as a loan, merely to give money to roads for money in return, ultimately to be foreclosed in the form of a mortgage, then it must be said that the diligence of Senators in pointing out the insufficiency of these securities is to be commended. If they see opposition to the bill on that ground, that opposition can not be overcome by these reports of the railroads.

But, Mr. President, I invite the Senate's attention to a homely illustration. Here is a building across the street valuable, the land upon which is very valuable, it is acceptable for residence, but those who have managed it have managed it so badly that they have not brought forth an income from it. They have dismembered it generally. They have left it dismantled; they have created a plague upon the building. They could not get any tenants; it could not produce a paying income. Would that be a good reason to urge against those who wanted to possess the building, who could give it industrious attention, who by rehabilitating it could rent it out in every room and draw a sure income and profit from it? I can not think so.

Thus I view this bill, Senators. I may be in error, amenable of course as I am to mistakes, but in this bill that apprehension was had in a part of the bill in committee as I helped shape it. I feared the opposition to the bill we should find with these deficiencies pointed out by these industries, Senators, when we take the property which is the property that is the security, but under our management we will make it pay for itself doubly and overdoubly, because we rid it of that incubus that has so long been fastened upon it in a vampire form as a fungus growth. That will no longer occur; it will not longer plague and destroy it. For that reason, sir, admitting the objection of the eminent Senators, I say it will be overcome by the mere transfer and change which the bill contemplated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. Gladly.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator, he justifies this legislation, in part at least, because he believes that the operation of the railroads will be much more efficient and economical in the hands of the Government than under private management; and I deduce from his remarks that he supports the contention of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] that the Government ought to own the railroads, because it will operate them with greater efficiency and economy, than the present owners can or will operate them.

Does not the Senator know from his large experience in public life, from his extensive acquaintance with governments, ancient, medieval, and modern, and particularly our own Government and our own States and municipalities, that whatever work or enterprise the Government undertakes, whether the improvement of rivers and harbors or the erection of buildings—indeed, whatever it touches, the cost has been greatly in excess of what it would have been under private management and ownership? Does not the Senator know that notwithstanding there have been mistakes, and in many instances extravagancies, it is claimed by railroads that 75 to 95 per cent of all industries of the United States which have been chartered have gone through the bankruptcy courts or have been reorganized because of mismanagement, that the railroads present perhaps a better picture than the private enterprises of the United States that arose under corporate authority, and have been the subject of corporate control and management?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LEWIS. At this time, if the Senator from California desires to respond to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I wish to suggest simply one very brilliant example quite contrary to what has been suggested by the Senator from Utah, the history of the Panama Canal. The greatest engineering feat ever undertaken by man was built governmentally and built for a less sum than private enterprise could have done it.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. LEWIS. I, of course, yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I wish to dissent absolutely and unqualifiedly from the statement made by the eminent Senator from California. I submit, Mr. President, that that canal could have been constructed for 50 per cent of what it has to date cost the Government. I have not time nor opportunity to go into that now.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. I crave the indulgence of the Senator from Illinois for just a moment.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield gladly.

Mr. KNOX. I who had something to do with the Panama Canal can not allow that statement to pass unchallenged. I wish to say to the Senator from Utah that there has been nothing in the last 15 or 18 years to which I have devoted as much attention in all its phases as to the Panama Canal. It happens that the canal would never have been constructed at Panama if it had not rested upon my own opinion as Attorney General of the United States that there was a good and sufficient title to be obtained. Otherwise, under the provisions of the Spooner Act it would have been built at Nicaragua.

It happened that I was on the Canal Committee of the Senate when we decided the present type of the canal, taking up all the engineering questions and all the questions of cost and passing on the difference between the propriety of building the present lock type and a so-called sea-level canal. It also happened that I was on the side of the minority of that committee in favor of the present type and was appointed to conclude the argument in favor of the minority report.

What I am stating, Mr. President, I am not stating boastfully, but for the purpose of telling you the basis of some of my information.

It likewise happened that after the Senate had been polled and it had been determined that the sea-level type had a comfortable majority, when the vote was taken the present type won out, and several Senators did me the compliment to make the statement that they had been convinced by my argument.

I might go on and tell you half a dozen other very important relations that I have sustained to that project. I happened to be in the Cabinet when the question of construction came up, when tentative bids from private parties were considered, which were so overwhelmingly beyond anything that the engineers had informed us in committee that the work would cost that President Roosevelt decided that he would dismiss all idea of private contract and make no further consideration of proposed bids, but that he would send Gen. Goethals to Panama and tell him to build the canal, and he did build it. I also happen to know a great deal about the construction of the canal; for instance, the building of the Gatun Lock and those great gates, which are the wonders of the world, and I am perfectly certain if the Senator from Utah makes the investigation it will convince him that the canal could not have been built for less than it cost the Government, and he would find that it would have cost 50 to 100 per cent more.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am glad to have had this contribution made to the debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May I adopt what has been said by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania concerning the Panama Canal? It answers conclusively the vigorous dissent of the Senator from Utah, and refutes conclusively his animadversions upon that marvelous, efficient, and economical construction by the Government.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, this much must be said before I respond directly to the query of the Senator from Utah: It has been published through certain railroad engineers—the statement that the Panama Canal could have been constructed with more effect and the slides averted, and these charges have been made in certain quarters. It is a very natural thing for the Senator from Utah to have his mind addressed to that early cost, because of those general publications; but the Senator from Pennsylvania, giving some definite reply to that, may disclose information of greater accuracy, we can readily conceive, and we can use the Panama Canal as a fitting illustration of some Government operation. But I do not have to enter into that, because I may amuse both Senators—the Senator from California and the Senator from Utah, who opposes his view—by saying I differ from both of them. I do not agree with the eminent Senator from California on one phase nor with the Senator from Utah upon the other. I am not at this time, sir, an advocate of the operation by the Government. I am for the ownership by the Government, the control by the Government, and then the matter of the operation of each piece of property and the need of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield to my colleague in a minute. If it were better that we should contract any particular operation through lease, I would regard that as a privilege of the Government. If it would be better it should be done through private contract, without regard to lease, I would approve it. If the Government found an instance where it could operate itself, and could do so by first disclosing that to its representatives and have it work on whatever commission might be constituted, then that, sirs, would meet my approval.

I decline to adopt the hard-and-fast rule of a Government operation of public utilities merely because it may own the utility, and I now want to say, sir, I gave to this subject as full investigation as my limited industry and capacity would afford. I happened to bear the position of legal officer of the city of Chicago when we were taking over the railroads. That is a great municipality, larger than many States of the Union in its population. Finally, sir, we reached a system of city ownership of property, but allowing it to be operated by private operators under an agreement and understanding with the city. Then later that was amended and changed, but in some form it now continues. During that time, not being convinced by something that the Senator from Utah has said, something that my eminent colleague yesterday referred to in respect to the Governments of Europe, a certain form of political management can lead to the defilement and certain destruction of it, and oftentimes a corruption of it. Then I answer the Senator saying specifically, sir, because some Governments have shown their inability to conduct these large enterprises with cleanliness and honor is no proof that we would fail or those same Governments have failed to conduct their private affairs, their loyalty, or patriotism by the standards of honor. Yet, sir, that would not argue that we would also be deficient in the same thing. Let me advise the Senator from Utah of a thing that arises in my mind. When it was assumed that we would build the road in Alaska the same objections were heard. It will be recalled that when we had to establish a cable by the Government the same objections were urged. When the Post Office Department was inaugurated the same objections were heard. I remind the Senator when the Federal reserve bank as a governmental institution was presented on this floor eminent Senators presented the terrible picture of my eminent friend from Utah. When the Farm Loan Board was presented ably by the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], setting forth its operations to benefit mankind, we had the same form of objection.

You will remember, Mr. President, that when there was presented on this floor legislation to provide for the insurance of ships by the Government the same forms of objection were raised; and when there was presented only a short time ago a bill to provide for the insurance of the soldiers these objections were revived, repeated, reaccentuated, reemphasized, and the same mournful prophecies were indulged in, until the atmosphere of the room was a cloud of danger. True, there have been some instances, as the Senator says, where there has been laxity, but because there has been such laxity in a few instances is no proof that it will occur in all.

My eminent colleague from Illinois yesterday adverted to certain Governments of Europe which had failed in their operations, but he could have well recalled that these same Governments failed in the administration of their local affairs so corruptly that many of their members were sent to the penitentiary because of their offenses.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I want at this time and place to file a plea of equitable set-off of Hog Island against the Panama Canal. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I know——

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should like to direct the attention of both Senators from Illinois to the fact that the money being spent on Hog Island is being spent under private contract and not by Government officials.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, in reply to my colleague's statement, in which he wishes to offset Hog Island against the Panama Canal, and does so as a matter of plea, I recall that, in the ordinary usages of court practice, if one does not wish to proceed under that plea, he moves to strike it out; but I would do it no such injury. I rather think it is timely to tender it for contemplation and for the reason that the junior Sentaor from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] gives, that it is a marvelous illustration of how the Government, advancing money upon the confidence of men engaged in private enterprise, could be so deceived by them, and of how, to use the words of the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], under the guise of patriotism, men could have so pillaged the Government, defiled their own honor, and debased the Republic before the world. Mr. President, in this place I would do no injustice. I will not sit in judgment on any matter that is now under inquiry, and I will qualify my statement by adding, "if the reports in the public press be accurate."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SHERMAN. There has not been a dollar paid on the Hog Island project that has not been paid by Government authority and under Government inspection. Even the piles that have been driven were inspected by Government authority, but when the work was rechecked it was found to be 25 per cent deficient. It is true, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] says, that some private interests probably have not performed their full duty, but it is a Government undertaking, and ought properly to be set-off here against the one isolated successful Government undertaking, namely, the construction of the Panama Canal. The only instance I know of in the history of the United States where the Government undertook a great work where the taxpayer has not been cut clean to the bone is the Panama Canal, and that was constructed under most unusual conditions, by the exercise of very great vigilance, in a time of peace, with subcontracting at the lowest possible limit, with labor and material provided under the most favorable conditions, and with the vigilance of the executive department and all of its distinguished helpers exerted to the utmost. Under such conditions as never were presented before the Panama Canal was built, and to cite that achievement as an instance of what the Government can do is a good deal like the frequent undertaking to prove that the Government can do anything. It has never done anything successfully of an essentially private nature except in the one instance, Mr. President, of the Panama Canal, cited here this morning. I can cite everything from the beginning of civilized government down to date, from the beginning of the Christian era until the Panama Canal was constructed, and can demonstrate that in no time has the Government ever, as compared with private enterprise, efficiently performed anything. It has not even in time of peace taken care of its own departments without permitting itself to become entangled by a red tape that can only be removed by criticism of men in authority even in time of great public peril. If we had undertaken anything of this kind in time of peace it would have been a fair test, it is said, but in time of war, when vigilance and promptness are required and when every public interest should be bent to the performance of the public service, we, by committees in this body, have been compelled to investigate and to remove the impediments that have been encountered because of the lack of energy and of ability in peace times to perform necessary functions by this Government. Yet, Mr. President, the Panama Canal is held up as an instance of Government efficiency.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LEWIS. If my colleague has finished—I do not want to interrupt him—I will yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, again I beg pardon of the Senator from Illinois for an interruption and the encroachment upon his time. I will not occupy his time to discuss what governments may have accomplished from the dawn of civilization. I am very glad that in the one instance challenged, namely, the Panama Canal, the work is admitted to have been performed well by the Government. As one of the Members of the Senate familiar with Hog Island developments, I want to make plain that the Hog Island situation results not from the Government doing the work but because the great financial interests and the great captains of industry of the Nation are doing the work, and doing the work as private contractors under a Government contract. So, unfortunately, Senators can not offset one against the other the two instances before us—the Panama Canal and the Hog Island scandal.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I think, in justice to the situation, that it is only fair to state that when the Panama Canal was first suggested it was estimated the cost of its construction would only be $110,000,000. The estimate was afterwards increased to $250,000,000, then to $300,000,000, and before the work was completed the cost ran up to about $500,000,000.

Mr. KING. And let me say, Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois will pardon me, that the work is not yet completed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And it never will be so long as the canal passes through an area where earth slides occur from time to time.

Mr. LEWIS. Did the Chair inquire if the Senator from Michigan desired me to yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield gladly to the Senator from Michigan, if he desires to proceed; otherwise, I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I want to say as to the Hog Island situation that I do not want to inject that into this discussion now, but I will discuss it in its proper time and place, and find out whether or not the island is improperly named. [Laughter.] It is sufficient to say, Mr. President, my original proposition, which I stated without any expectation of provoking this encroachment on the Senator's time, was in order to preserve my rights and to give due and timely notice of the equitable set-off that ought to be made, for the Government, I will say, since the Hog Island question became a mooted one here, supervised every step of the work, and if it has not restrained what I consider the avarice and the undue desire to profit on the part of certain private interests it is because of the Government's incompetence and negligence up to this time. It has apparently aroused itself at last, and has I think placed itself in a fair way of checking this undue profiteering; but it remains to say that the Government is in a fair condition there to be deprived of a large sum of money unjustly. Government contracts prove nothing in the construction of the Panama Canal as compared with the vast sums that have been taken away by Government contractors, beginning with the cantonments and running on down to Hog Island. At the proper time and place, on the floor of the Senate, when it is an issue, I shall present the matter at length, when I shall not encroach on some other Senator's time.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. I call the attention of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] to the fact that obviously he did not catch the emphasis with which the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] referred to the Hog Island difficulty. It seems to have turned out that it was because of the connection with that vast enterprise—vast in every respect; vast financially; and vast materially—of "captains of industry." That seems to have been the trouble down at Hog Island; and I suggest to the Government that if we want to avoid scandal as to these great enterprises, requiring great intelligence and a great expenditure of money, we should hereafter let them out to the corner grocery man or to the blacksmith.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If we did so, perhaps we might have a greater degree of honesty in the execution of contracts.

Mr. SHERMAN. The whisky ring, for instance, some years ago robbed the Government itself blind.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, as to this conflict between the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], I will leave to Patroclus and Ulysses the settlement of their own difficulties in their own tents. I will, however, refer for a moment, having been drawn quite afield, to the fact that my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] indicts everything that the Government has done from the beginning of the world to the present time, and seemingly my eminent colleague gives absolution to Government enterprise, only providing it exhausts the whole bloody atonement.

Mr. President, I recognize that on that question there will be many differences and that these differences will remain. This much, sir, I say to the eminent Senator from Illinois, who made his offset of Hog Island as against the Panama Canal, that I understand the Hog Island enterprise—and I use that word, of course, now, with full knowledge of its meaning—if the reports in the public press are accurate, is being investigated; and while that investigation is pending, of course we will not prejudice it. The only observation I can make upon it is that if reports be true, whether the island be properly named, the undertaking seems to have been justly characterized as more hog than island; but we must await the future development of the investigation in order to arrive at the truth, and we will refrain here from rendering judgment against anyone while he is upon trial and leave it to the judgment of those who have been constituted as his triers.

I wish to bring my observations to a close. I fancy I have taken time that other Senators would like to have occupied, and I do not wish to exhaust their opportunity. I shall conclude on the question of Government operation. I have but one other word upon it.

I trust whenever this Government shall make its advent into taking over these great public utilities, which are necessary to the public welfare, particularly those that spring from nature, for the welfare of man, that it will do so honestly, and will do so under the spirit of justice. I trust there will be no indication to any American citizen of a spirit of confiscation; that there will be no money expended by any citizen honestly for stock in any road that will not be justly returned to that citizen. I hope there will never be an aspect indicative of any property confiscated by this Government merely because of either commercial or military necessity; that when the time comes that we shall appropriate it in whatever nature we shall adopt, there shall be neither pillage nor robbery of any citizen, either of "the captain of industry" on the one hand or the defenseless toiler on the other.

Therefore, sir, when that era shall be ushered in, it will be ushered in within the law; that we will have liberty and justice according to the declared laws and policy of this country.

Mr. President, I therefore say to Senators whether this entrance of Government into this new era of the possession of public utilities shall be begun in order that mankind shall neither starve nor freeze at the dictation of the masters of finance or those who would be so selfish as to demoralize the community for their private gain, or whether we shall take them upon the ground of essential national defense, that we might anticipate such an hour as is already around us, and that which I fear is multiplying far in excess of the present into much more disastrous conditions than any man can at this particular time with propriety describe. Whether from that reason or any other we are upon it. Sir, I dare prophesy to you that in the next national convention, or whatever form the nomination of our President shall take, the one principal issue of the political campaign, as a matter of domestic and home discussion, will be this one of Government taking over these enterprises for the uses of Government when necessary to governmental welfare in the future policy of the Government in that direction. I prophesy that that one question, coupled with those that shall grow out of the war and the peace treaty, will be the great questions upon which our next election will depend and turn. So whether we shall invite it now, eminent Senators, or are prepared to consider it now, rest assured it will be, as I see it, the most important question for your consideration at the next great arbitration before this country as to who shall be its Chief Magistrate—the President of the United States.

Mr. President, I have a conclusion, and I tender it. There are those in the land who fear that in America there will arise the Bolsheviki or such a spirit as is now in Russia and as threatens Russia and Europe. Senators, I do not indulge in any such apprehensions. I think we do a great deal of violence to the property of America to let the owners feel that we see such a shadow. We do great violence to our own institutions by intimating that they have now reached a point where they could produce such apprehensions or anything in them could justify such.

Let me assure Senators, as I see it, we have no such fear in America; and the reason: These particular revolts, such as the bolsheviki, or in all the world under Marius, Gracchus, or under leadership in China, or that now of Trotzky and Lenine, in Russia, have only sprung up where the land of the people has been so monopolized by a few that homes for the individuals have been impossible, or, as was the condition in Ireland some years past, which is familiar to us, and as was the case also in Poland, where the land was so possessed that every man toiled as a tenant, and what he produced was appropriated from him, so that he had no hope to possess the fruits of his own toil or the blessings of independence. There is no such condition in America. As rapidly as the cities shall fill up and there ensues great competition as to toil, there will be land inviting, land of which you, eminent Senators from the West, so profoundly speak from time to time. Your gates are open from Omaha to St. Paul, out toward Ogden. There lies that great West, ever beckoning on, through to Alaska and Hawaii, where homes are ever ready for 20 generations yet unborn. As rapidly as there shall arise in our cities turmoil and confusion, resulting from competition of labor or discontent, men will move just a little farther into the wider field, into the open area, into the welcoming gate, into the new land, where they will possess their homes, and where they will own the fruits of their industry and enjoy independence. So the condition which makes for these which we call the bolsheviki does not exist in our land; and that class of men who revolt under the name of Industrial Workers of the World, or any other euphonious title, to war against every form of government, every form of restraint, all forms of justice, can not justify their action on the ground of a necessity of conditions. It is born of the spirit that does exist in certain mankind against every form of restraint, and which revolts against honest toil, and is ever lodging its protests by assaults waged against the organization of government itself. They present us nothing more than a repetition of those illustrations which have attended all government since it blossomed under the sun and smiled as under the blessing of God.

But, sirs, I do warn you—if I may be pardoned for that admonition—that unless we take some steps as legislators to let the great mass of the people see that these public agencies, created for their welfare, are possessed, dominated, and directed for that welfare through themselves by that agency they call government, they, mistaking the condition, will in one form or another organize into expressions of revolt or revolution against law, against government, against officials, and breathe here and there spasmodic anarchy from street corners to communities, from time to time unsettling all government, overthrowing all law, destroying every form of organized society.

Nothing, sir, will so compose this country, ward off the possibility of such revolts as we see around us, give confidence to the toiler, infuse a sense of regard in the farmer, and make the public at large feel that this is their Government, as to assure them by our legislation that all of the agencies produced by nature for their welfare have been taken charge of by their great trustee, their Government, to be administered in their behalf, and not to be controlled by private agencies for personal pillage to the denial of public welfare. Then, sir, with this assured, the people will be secure, communities serene, our land restored again to confidence in law, and we will move on as a government of competition in genius—in industry of man, of prosperity of nation, and of glory of Republic.

Therefore I support the bill, because I feel that it opens the era when this Government at last shall announce itself a Government, not a delusion; a Republic of law and justice, not a combination of confusion and disappointment.

I thank the Senate for its indulgence.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, when the transportation bill, which we now have under discussion, was reported last week, I offered the following amendment:

SEC. 13. That the Federal control of railroads and transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall continue for and during the period of the war and until Congress shall thereafter order otherwise.

This amendment simply reinserts the original provision in the bill as it appeared when first introduced, and the importance of retaining this original matter in the bill so as to prevent setting any fixed date within which the Government would be obliged to return control of the railroads to their original owners should be apparent to every Member.

The bill, as amended by the committee, prescribed, among other things, that within 18 months after the close of the war the Government shall return all the transportation lines to their original owners which have been taken over.

Mr. President, as I look at this question, such legislation would not be fair to the public nor to the stockholders of the railroads, because it would not give a reasonable time to the country to practically demonstrate Government ownership, which should be done. Surely no one would be so unfair as to say that during the war period, such as is upon the country today, and during the few months allowed by this bill after the war closes a fair chance could be had to test the wisdom and advisability of this manner of handling and controlling the transportation systems of the United States. And Congress, in my judgment, would do a very unwise thing to prevent by legislation a full, impartial, and satisfactory demonstration of such course by the Government. We have been compelled through lack of efficiency to assume Government control, and now that we have been forced to do this, would it not be the part of wisdom and equal justice to everybody to retain possession of these carriers at least until we could make the most thorough and practical demonstration of this great question, which has agitated the public mind for many years, and forever settle the question one way or the other? It would neither be fair to the Government nor to the railroads of the country to handle it as the bill provides; and when I use the word "railroads" in this connection I want it to be understood that I mean the small stockholders—those who have the actual money invested—because I believe they are anxious to test the advisability of this great undertaking, so as to give them an opportunity to determine whether their money has been honestly and efficiently handled by these great corporations and fair dividends returned in accordance with legitimate profits, honestly earned, if the roads had been operated on strictly business principles.

Mr. President, this is one of the few questions in which, to my mind, we all have about an even start. I assume to know but very little about the subject, and, so far as my knowledge goes, no one in this body has had any practical experience with the question of Federal ownership of transportation systems. The only experience I have ever had along this line is with our Government-owned subway monorail in the basement of this building, and the transportation and fares have been entirely satisfactory to me. [Laughter.] But, as one Member of this body, I would like to see a real practical test of the question. From my observation through life, I have reached the conclusion and desire to place myself on record as favoring Government ownership of railroads, at least until its worth to the people has been fully demonstrated. This is something in our history which is entirely new and untried, and, if we desire, we can give it a thorough trial as to its merits now. We have not taken control of the transportation lines of the country by force, but by the consent of the railroads themselves, and we are agreeing to pay them a high rate of interest. They are perfectly willing to pass the buck along to the Government to operate them in times like the present, which try the souls of men. We have accepted the responsibility. Why, then, should we be compelled to fix a date when we shall deliver them back?

I have been informed by those in a position to know that the practice of many railroads, in building their lines, has been to immediately bond the road for about twice the actual cost of its construction, sometimes more and sometimes less, and then expect them to pay dividends upon the full amount of the bonded indebtedness in excess of the actual capital, as well as the capital stock itself, and also upon this basis go before the Interstate Commerce Commission and present in justification of their claims for rates to the public for transportation and service the same unjust and unfair practice. That is exactly what they do, and they will ask us to do the same thing in our settlement with them.

Mr. President, the argument of those who are opposed to Government ownership is that the Interstate Commerce Commission is empowered to fix rates and regulate traffic in the interest of the people, thereby protecting the public from exorbitant rates. My understanding of the power of this commission is that it may fix rates upon certain classifications, and they may make certain orders, but the railroads may to-morrow change the rates of to-day by simply reclassifying the goods and freight shipped, and we all know that orders emanating from the Interstate Commerce Commission have been violated every day in the year as they existed in the past, and will be violated as long as the transportation systems of the country are in private hands.

The one question of the greatest importance to the country in transportation matters is freight rates. This is a question which will make or break individuals or companies in any line of production, and will make it possible or impossible for small producers to compete with large corporate producers. I refer to the custom for many years past, and still the custom of to-day, concerning the shipment of goods to terminal points—the great centers of the country—at a less rate than for which goods can be shipped over the same line of road to less favored points which are much less distant.

I ask permission to insert a letter in the RECORD which I recently received touching on this point:

SPOKANE, WASH., February 12, 1918.

Hon. EDWIN S. JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: When the Newlands Commission was in session last fall in San Francisco, evidence taken there disclosed that the Interstate Commerce Commission had granted over 10,000 exceptions to the fourth section of the act to regulate interstate commerce.

The granting of these exceptions has been so wide and sweeping that it has gotten to a point now where the exception seems to be the rule of the Interstate Commerce Commission without regard to what the act of Congress may have been.

I want to call your attention to the attached data which is typical of 10,000 commodities on which unjust discrimination is being permitted in violation of the interstate-commerce act.

While illustrative of Spokane and other inland empire cities similarly situated, it will be found upon examination of railroad tariffs that this discrimination is in force upon the same commodity in a varying degree in every city and town west of Brunswick, N. Dak., to Pacific coast terminals, yet Brunswick is nearer New York by 1,458 miles than any Pacific coast terminal.

May we count upon your support of Senate bill 313, which will correct this situation?

Very truly, yours,

W. S. MCCREA,
Chairman Freight Rate Committee.

This is one of the things which I desire to complain of, as I understand the Interstate Commerce Commission permits this to be done, which must of necessity have a tendency to build up the great centers and large interests at the expense of the intermediate territory and its business men, upon which we are depending to-day to feed these great centers and the world. Surely this sort of discrimination can not appeal to fair-minded people as being just and equal. No man enjoys being robbed under the same Constitution which says he shall not be, and that is exactly what has been the general practice for years past, under the system of private ownership of transportation. The same plan of operation applies to passenger fares, which is, of course, of much less importance to the country, as it only affects those who travel, while the question of freight rate affects all; but the same principle is involved in one as in the other. I can go down to the station here in this city to-day and buy a first-class railroad ticket from Washington to Chicago for the same money it would cost me to travel to a point 25 or 50 miles this side of Chicago, on the same road and on the same train. Things of this nature are in accordance with the system of private ownership as it exists to-day. They are neither fair to the public nor to the stockholder, and in no sense do they conform to justice, but discriminate in the interest of the more favored few. Other practices of privately owned railroads may be likened to a wheel within a wheel. Companies are built up by the managers, such as town-site companies, steamboat and ferry companies, trolley lines, wharves, and so forth, and various other business ventures of a like nature, which make the manipulators rich at the expense of the stockholders and the public.

I can not believe, Mr. President, that the Congress of the United States desires to handle this great subject and go on record as not giving the people a fair test of this great question, and do not as yet believe it. Efficiency at the least possible expense to them is what the people of the country demand in transportation and what they are entitled to from us, as far as we have the power to act, and surely with the unsettled conditions which will exist after the war is over, operation for a few months, as provided in the bill, would not give us a fair trial. I would rather turn the carriers back the next day after the war than set a fixed time when we must do so, for such a course would only add to our enormous expense without any chance for returns, and would not afford an opportunity to demonstrate the wisdom of Government management.

The opponents of this amendment, and of the bill for that matter, will argue that public ownership of the transportation system of the country is directly contrary to the fundamental principles upon which this Government rests. That argument should have little weight, because, if we demonstrate that this important business can be handled to greater benefit for the people than it has been handled, such argument must naturally fall by the wayside, as it will. Again they argue that political influence will be a serious objection. Such conclusion, as well as the former, should have little consideration in the public mind, and they do not, because, if the railroads in the past have been handled by high-minded, public-spirited men as individual financial enterprises, as has been claimed, surely they would be handled by as equally high-minded and patriotic men on behalf of the Government, because in the one case undoubtedly we are forced to admit that they have been operated for personal profit while in the case of Government ownership no such claim could be advanced. Again, we admit, a necessity exists; otherwise Congress would not have given the President power to take over the transportation business of the country, and it did a wise thing when it gave him that power. Certainly, then, Congress should be willing to enact a law in which it can trust itself in saying when it would be best for the country to turn the railroads back to their original owners if ever. The transportation lines of the United States should be public highways for the use and benefit of all the public. They are the main arteries of trade and commerce, extending from one part of the country to the other, building up the country and making us a great Nation which loves liberty and equality, and these lines should be for the benefit of the public in all that the word implies. They should stand in the same relation to the public as does the public roadway upon which we travel every day. Is there anyone in this body who would permit the ordinary highways and roads of this country to be owned by corporations? No one would consider such a thing for a moment. How, then, can we best serve all the people should be our constant study with regard to these matters and be given our most careful and serious consideration before acting upon this important question.

One immense saving, which I can see in lessening the cost of operation of transportation companies by the Government would be to eliminate the thousands of highly paid officials, lobbyists, attorneys, and certain employees in various capacities, who are a surplusage to actual needs and a dead load to the railroads themselves, costing millions of dollars each year. But this policy has grown up with the system, and they are unable to change it. This item takes that much from stockholders and the public. If the opponents of this amendment are sure that Government ownership is wrong they should at least be fair enough to their constituents and themselves, who are vitally interested in this matter, to give it a chance to be fairly tried as to its practicability and to give the necessary time in order to do it. If we find, after a fair trial, that it would be a failure, I for one will acknowledge my mistake and vote to return these transportation companies to private ownership; but I first want a chance and a reasonable opportunity to be given in order that we may all know from practical experience and demonstration just what Government ownership would do for us.

No question to-day, aside from the great conflict in which this country is now engaged, is of such importance to every man, woman, and child in America as is this question, because it directly affects every one in some way. The business man, the laboring man, the man on the farm, and the man in the factory all have been made to contribute from their daily labor something unrighteously taken from them to sustain and perpetuate a system, which permits a few men to grow rich at the expense of the poor man and his family.

We have taken, and will take, millions of our best young men from their homes, positions, and professions, depriving many of them of their best years for accumulating savings for the comforts of life when they are old, destroying in many cases the support of families, and send them into the ranks to uphold and preserve the Nation. Let us hope that bye and bye thousands and hundreds of thousands will come back to us. We will thank God for that day. These men will then be forced to take up the battle of life anew. Do not you think we owe it to them to assist in starting them in civil pursuits again with the best possible economic chance we can give them? If you do, you should vote for this amendment. 'Let us try the experiment fully and not tie the hands of the Government in this great undertaking and important matter before starting; and if we find it is best for all the people of this grand old U. S. A., not one of us would favor returning the transportation lines under Federal control to private hands. You would rather keep them and pay a reasonable and fair compensation to their present owners as soon as we could.

Let me present what the representatives of over 2,000,000 workmen say on this point, and I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

To the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

Being fully cognizant of the seriousness of the crisis confronting our country and realizing the dangers besetting our liberties, it is the honest, earnest desire of the railroad employees to give our full, loyal, and united support to our Government and to make certain, clear, and decisive the conclusion of our aims. Therefore we desire to make effective all the agencies of the Government, and we fully appreciate that the question of transportation is one of the important factors at this time.

While we are pledged to, and hereby reaffirm our pledge of, loyalty and whole-hearted support to our country, our Government, and our President during this war, we are aware of the seriousness of the situation that inevitably must follow immediately after the close of hostilities in the readjustment of conditions in the United States; and whereas the Government of the United States has, by proclamation of the President, assumed control of the transportation systems for the period of the war, with which we are in accord, we believe that full time should be given after the close of hostilities to enable just, fair, and impartial determination of the proper methods of adjustment of the rights and equities of the public, the owners of the transportation lines so taken, and of the employees thereof; and as representatives of nearly 2,000,000 employees of the railroads of the United States we most earnestly and respectfully petition the Congress of the United States not to fix a time limit at which the railroads must be turned back to private ownership, leaving this question for future determination, and thereby giving ample time for the adjustment of matters growing out of the temporary control of same, with equal justice to all parties at interest.

Very respectfully,

H. E. Wills, A. G. C. E. and national legislative representative Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; P. J. McNamara, vice president and national legislative representative Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers; W. M. Clark, vice president and national legislative representative Order of Railway Conductors; W. N. Doak, vice president and national legislative representative Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen; A. O. Wharton, president railway employees' department, American Federation of Labor; Martin F. Ryan, grand president Brotherhood Railway Carmen of America; J. A. Franklin, president International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, Iron Ship Builders, and Helpers of America; F. J McNulty, president International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; James J. Hynes, president Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' International Association; J. W. Kline, president International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers; Wm. H. Johnston, president International Association of Machinists.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I come from the great Middle West, where the people have been robbed by the railroads for so long that they consider it a matter of course, and have almost ceased to expect any relief, and I feel sure in speaking as I do, in so far as South Dakota is concerned, that almost the entire country would desire that the question of Government ownership of railroads be most thoroughly tested now. I am fully aware that the Interstate Commerce Commission has tried to do its duty in relieving the people of this unjust burden. Its members have worked hard, diligently, and faithfully; but with the vast amount of work upon their hands, if one should take up personally the claim of any small shipper with the commission to-day, he should be young when he started in, for in the ordinary course he would be dead before a ruling was made and the provisions of such ruling had been carried out by the railroads. This is the first time in its history that the United States has ever had a chance to determine this question, and we will fail in our duty as the Representatives of the Nation and the several States if we hesitate to go thoroughly into the wisdom of it.

I am a firm believer in the doctrine of letting the people know where you stand on any public question in order that you may have their advice and counsel. Viewing this subject as I do to-day I unhesitatingly desire to go on record as being a firm believer and an advocate of the principle of Government ownership of railroads, believing it to be for the best interests of all the people of the country and that it will bring to them great relief on all questions in which the past system of railroad management has entered into our business life.

Mr. President, there is another great economic question in connection with this subject, as I see it, linked to it by natural conditions, and that is the great labor question. As I look at this subject, it has much to do with my conclusions relating to Government ownership. I can not see why it would not be one of the strongest factors in settling this great question, which could possibly be put into practice. I believe that it would go a long way toward solving this problem, and as I view it, the labor question is the next great and important question which we must face. So I ask you to think about this in connection with the subject matter now before us.

As I have said, the management of the railroads has been taken over by the Government with the consent of the railroad managers themselves, for which we are to pay into their treasuries during the war a consideration based on respective rates of dividends during the three years ending June 30, 1917. These managers doubtless knew, as we all do, that the roads had not been and could not be handled satisfactorily to the general public. At least they were not giving the public the conveniences of travel heretofore enjoyed. Is it not that they may try to make Government control as unpopular as possible for the purpose of demonstrating to the people that if adopted in its entirety it would be a failure? Mr. President, I do not accuse the managers of the roads of having this object in view, but I will say to you that I would not be surprised had they considered this question fully, which, if successfully carried out, would tend to hinder the favorable consideration of this subject, which has constantly been growing in the minds of the people for a number of years. I have had a number of instances cited to me, from which I have arrived at the conclusion that this is possible. A Senator told me the other day that when he was coming down from New York there was no water in the Pullman car in which he was riding and that it was necessary for him to walk three cars ahead before he could get water with which to wash his hands and face. An agent at a small railway station in South Dakota, I learn, had his salary cut 65 cents per day and the depot was ordered closed at 4.30 in the afternoon, after which hour each day no freight would be received for shipment. A number of other instances of similar character have been reported. My purpose in mentioning these small matters is to place conditions as I see them before you for consideration.

There are many evil practices which a change in the policy of transportation ownership would affect and entirely eliminate in the country. There would be no pooling of stock; no dividing up of territory where railroads should be built by any gentlemanly agreements at the expense of millions of producers; no monopolization of stock to exploit it; no discriminatory rates; no bond issues for twice the cost of construction; no small stockholders fleeced out of their holdings through bankruptcy proceedings; no fluctuation of stock to catch the suckers. These things would all be wiped off the slate and in their place would come stability of market values, equality of stockholders composed of all the people, just treatment for the many who have suffered greatly in the past, and the rights of all the people of this great Republic. I will admit that it might hurt some; it might affect a few stock brokers; it might affect the great gambling centers of the country; it might compel some of the railroad manipulators and so-called great captains of industry to go at some kind of honest work; but those who have suffered long at their hands would not be apt to shed any tears at the new order of things, and so I hope you will vote for this amendment, or one of like character, which does not fix any definite time in which the Government will be compelled to turn the roads back to their original owners.

In conclusion permit me to say, Mr. President, that I believe the provision contained in my amendment is fair and right, and by its adoption justice will have been done to all the people.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, in the act approved August 29, 1916, the Army appropriation bill of that year, Congress enacted the following provision:

> The President in time of war is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation or any part thereof, and to utilize the same to the exclusion, as far as may be necessary, of all other traffic thereon for the transfer or transportation of troops, war material, and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable.

The emergency, however, to which Congress referred was the trouble with Mexico and the presence upon the borders of this Republic and the Republic of Mexico of a large number of American troops. Yet, because the language employed by Congress was general in its terms, two and a half years after the enactment of a provision which was intended to apply to an entirely different situation the President of the United States by proclamation undertakes to take control of and operate the entire railway system of the United States.

I need not say that I share the very clear and forceful opinion expressed on this floor yesterday by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the effect that the legislation under which the President assumed to act not only did not mean to authorize him to take the action he has taken, but was utterly and absolutely invalid if any railroad in this country saw fit to resist it, because our Supreme Court in adjudications that are unbroken has uniformly decided that Congress can not take over private property for public use without providing for just compensation therefor in the act that authorizes the taking over, and no such provision as that was made in this act. It is therefore apparent that the railroads are not being taken over and have not been taken over against their will or without their consent. Indeed, no well-informed man will controvert the statement that the reasons for this action have not been primarily connected with this war and are largely if not almost entirely financial.

It is true there has been congestion in the railway systems of the country, but how is that congestion to be relieved if the same men are to operate the railroads under Mr. McAdoo? It is true there has been some trouble about pooling and about traffic directions, but it was not necessary in order to cure either of those troubles to take over and operate the railroads of the country. Possibly without any additional law, probably, however, with some slight changes of statute law, the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other tribunal that Congress wished to vest with the authority could be given the power to make these necessary pooling and traffic arrangements and directions without any necessity whatever for the Government to operate the railroad systems of the country.

Mr. President, the real reason for this transaction, for the proclamation of the President of December 28, 1917, assuming to take control, assuming to operate the entire railroad systems of the country under this act of Congress more than two years ago, which was never drafted for any such purpose, is financial. Yet that reason is of such overwhelming strength that it can not fail to appeal to every one of us, and it will not fail to appeal to the country when the country understands it.

The railroads have a bonded debt maturing, according to the report of the committee, one hundred and eighty-eight million and odd thousands—hundreds of thousands—I will just read the millions—in 1918; $188,000,000, in round numbers, in 1919; $186,000,000 in 1920; and $440,000,000, nearly $441,000,000, in 1921.

Mr. President, it has been thought that because of the Government demand for money to carry on the war and of the necessity to float the different issues of bonds that have been already floated and that must be floated in the future, the money market would not respond in a manner sufficient to enable these railroads to meet these maturing obligations, and therefore that it was imperatively necessary that something should be done. That I readily concede, that reason I can understand, that situation I think I can comprehend, but I submit to the Senate and to the country that it was not necessary to take the extreme step of taking over and operating the railroads of this country as a whole in order to provide for these debts. In so far as their operation is necessary to the conduct of the war, in so far as their operation is necessary to the movement of troops, supplies, and equipment, and things of all sorts that contribute to a successful prosecution of the war, undoubtedly the Government could have done one or two things. It could either have advanced the money out of the Public Treasury in the shape of a loan, and that is what it is going to do anyhow, without taking over and operating the property, or it could, with just as much right and with just as much power and with just as much authority, have suspended, temporarily, the collection of these debts, as it suspends temporarily the collection of the debts of the soldiers or the sailors who are fighting for the flag.

So, I say, when I come to consider this situation, my mind halts at the very threshold of this question upon the preliminary question whether or not this taking over of the railroads was necessary. If it was, in my judgment, necessary in order to adequately prosecute this war, I would unhesitatingly support it as earnestly and uncompromisingly as I oppose the Government ownership and operation of railroads or any other form of private business. But, unless and until it is necessary, and unless and until that necessity is demonstrated to a reasonable degree to my mind, I find myself utterly unable to vote for a proposition that goes to this extreme before the necessity for it arises and before the justification for it can be fairly and reasonably established.

My disinclination to do that is enhanced by the fact that in the bill itself provision is made, not that this Government ownership and operation—it amounts to temporary ownership, of course, and to technical operation at least—shall end with the war or within any reasonable period thereafter, say 90 days or even 6 months—it did not take us 6 hours to take them over—but the bill provides that it shall take us 18 months to turn them loose. So if, by the grace of God, a just and honorable peace should come to this country, in common with the most of the balance of the world, in any reasonably near-by time, we would be still committed by this legislation to the uncertain and dangerous experiment—socialistic in its nature and, in my judgment, certain to prove destructive in its results—of Government ownership and operation of the railroads of this country for a period of some two years, as suggested by the House bill, or a year and a half, as proposed by the Senate bill, even if peace came to-morrow.

Another thing is an objection suggested in the able minority report of the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. By the way, let me say that Senator has given to this subject—although he does not approach it from exactly the angle and standpoint that I do—a consideration and an ability which commands not only my respect but my admiration.

The Senator from Iowa made the point in his minority report that if this is to be done to strengthen the railroads of the country, to weather them over this financial storm, to provide for them a money market to make up for the money market which they will lose by reason of the Government's necessity, it is manifestly unjust, wholly unfair to extend the benefits of such legislation to the strong and deny them to the weak. Are we only to take the big roads that are strong and earning money and weathering this gale better than anybody else and leave alone and unprotected the smaller and weak and helpless railroads? Does the rain fall on the just and the unjust alike? Does the statute work on the rich and the poor alike? Does the law apply to the big and the small alike? No; it is left with the President to do as he pleases, and already the Director has announced that these smaller railroads will not be taken over, will not be given the benefit which this legislation intends to confer on the railroad system as a whole.

I understand—and I think I violate no personal confidence when I say it—that the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, the junior Senator [Mr. SMITH], who reports this bill, intends to offer an amendment to meet that situation and to treat all the railroads alike, when we come to the detailed consideration of the bill, and I intend to support it. I hope it will pass.

Let me read, because it is short and compact, the observations of the Senator from Iowa on this subject. I am reading from his minority report:

> THE SHORT-LINE INDEPENDENT COMPETITIVE ROADS.
> The President construes the act of 1916 to give him authority to take possession and operate any railroad or any part of any railroad. During the hearings it was clearly indicated by the Director General that it was not the purpose to take over all, or even many, of the short-line independent competitive roads. It is obvious that there are a large number of short-line roads which will not be affected by Government operation, and as to these nothing is said; but, on the other hand, there are a large number of comparatively short roads which compete with the trunk lines for traffic, and these roads will be absolutely destroyed if some arrangement is not made for their protection. While in a sense their operation by the Government may not be necessary for the successful conduct of the war—

And that may be said about the whole delectable scheme, by the way—> they have all been built to give the communities which they serve relief from the monopoly of trunk lines. The welfare of the localities through which they pass is dependent upon their existence, and public interest demands their full and complete operation. If their relations with the trunk lines are destroyed by the diversion of the traffic which they have heretofore carried the outcome is perfectly clear. When the war ends and the big systems are restored these small, independent, competitive roads will fall into the hands of the great systems for substantially nothing.

They will neither weather the traffic storms nor the financial gales that will fall upon them, and blow about them—

It is probable that if these roads were taken over the liability which the Government assumes would not be materially, if at all, increased, but even if it is enhanced by a small amount the Government can well afford to take something from the excessive compensation which it proposes to guarantee to the big roads in order to save some of the little ones.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I interrupt the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The question I desire to ask the Senator is this: I will preface my remarks by saying that I am opposed to the maximum rates proposed to be paid to the trunk lines; but does the Senator think that Congress would be justified in taking over the short lines of roads just in order to save the roads from bankruptcy?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is what we are taking over the big ones for.

Mr. VARDAMAN. We are taking over the big roads to serve the country, to carry on the war, and not to serve the railroads.

Mr. HARDWICK. They can be required to serve now, and they dare not refuse. There is no use dodging the question. I know the Senator is not trying to dodge it, but there is no need for anybody to try to dodge it. We are taking over the railroads because, in the opinion of the President and railroad people and a great many well-informed people, their financial interests require us to do it; they do not know how they are going to get the money during the next two or three years if the Government loans are to continue in order to enable this country to prosecute the war.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator really think that the purpose of the taking over of the roads is in the interest of the roads?

Mr. HARDWICK. I have not any doubt about it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That statement is, I think, unwarranted.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course the Senator is entitled to his own opinion; but I will venture the statement that not one Senator out of ten will vote for this bill who in his heart believes anything else.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I most assuredly can not agree with the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator does not think it is the financial situation of the railroads that is at the bottom of this?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I would not charge the administration with that. Taking over the railroads by the Government for the purpose of protecting the interests of the railroads would, it strikes me, be indefensible.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am not charging the administration with it. I say the situation that confronts the country is such that if we are to continue to float billion-dollar loans, three billion, five billion, or seven billion, or ten billion dollar loans, month after month and year after year, the money market will soon be in such a condition that something will have to be done if these agencies of transportation are to operate and meet their indebtedness. But I do not think it is necessary to take them over and operate them. I would rather lend them the money and let the owners operate the roads themselves than to do that. I would rather postpone the collection of their obligations, just as we do with soldiers and sailors. Their operation is necessary to prosecute this war, and we have just as much power to do it in the one case as we have in the other.

I admit that I am somewhat of an old-fashioned Democrat. My mind moves, conservatively, along settled lines. To me it is not necessarily true that what is is necessarily right; but to my mind it is necessarily true that you have got to show me that something you propose is better than the existing order before I am willing to make a change. I think that is sensible progress as well as common sense. Anyway, it is as I view the question. To my mind, from the beginning of this war until the present moment, and I am afraid for some time yet, it seems to me that this country and its Government, its Congress, and its Executive—you notice I class them all together—have made one colossal mistake, which runs through all our plans, through all our preparations, through all our legislation, and through all our executive and administrative acts. What is that mistake? That mistake is that on the threshold of a great war that is to try American strength and that is to test American vitality, that is to challenge American power, we have undertaken to reverse every process of thought and action and feeling and sentiment that have animated our people and have made this country great and strong and powerful and rich and mighty among the nations of the world. It seems to me that it would be just as foolish if a strong man, the vigor and strength of whose manhood is approved, when called upon to face the physical test of his life in mortal combat with a foe, it may be with naked hands, should undertake to reverse all the processes of his life that have made him strong in the few weeks that he was training for the fight.

Ah, Senators, there can be no doubt, in my mind at least, that you would find a greater America, a stronger America, a more efficient America, a more united America in soul, in spirit, in thought, in action, in word, and in deed, if you would pay some regard to the processes by which our national life has developed, if you would pay some regard to the old-fashioned principles, if you would utilize the strength that has come to us naturally, if you would quit trying to combat Prussian autocracy across the seas by establishing in America among her free people an autocracy that is little different from the autocracy over there.

What is the remedy? Whenever you find something that hurts, whenever you find some place where the shoe pinches, instead of going back to the old doctrines of individualism, to the sacred doctrines of democracy and of Americanism alike, you jump at once to the conclusion that you can only successfully combat private monopolies, that you admit your impotency to destroy or control, by establishing in their lieu public monopolies that are hardly more tolerable and certainly little less defensible.

For one I do not believe in it; for one I am opposed to it; for one I am willing to require the railroads, the steamboats, and everybody in this country to do all that is needed to furnish and supply the troops to wage and prosecute this war; but I say you can do that without taking over a tremendous task like the Government ownership of railroads or the Government operation of railroads. That is not necessary, or it would not be necessary under any circumstances, except now and then, when a railroad broke down or some part of the system failed, if that should happen; and I do not think that is likely to occur.

Mr. President, I listened with great interest, with admiration for his facility of expression, for his brilliancy of rhetoric, and for his cogency of logic to my warm personal friend, the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], in his dissertation this morning. He leaped from continent to continent, from one planetary system to another, from universe to universe, from the North Pole to the Equator, in his discussion of this question, and yet every leap brought us to a more attractive stage of the journey and to a more entertaining portion of the distinguished Senator's admirable speech.

The thing that impressed me most was what the Senator said about the destruction of our dual system of government; about the concentration of power, not only here in Washington, and the Senator might have said, but also in the hands of one man, at the expense of the several State governments. Oh, my heart bled, Mr. President, as the distinguished Senator sang that mournful dirge over the tomb of the States; and I want to say to you in sober earnestness, in a spirit of alarm, that he is right. During a service in this Capitol, now approaching its sixteenth year, I have seen the steady march of these tremendous powers, of this centralizing, unifying, autocratic power. I have seen it march by leaps and bounds, unchecked and unimpeded, through every administration during which I have been serving here; but I must confess that it is with the deepest sorrow and the most profound regret that I have seen it more terribly accelerated during this administration than during any other, and that, too, long before this war began.

Are the States defunct? Is the Government that we love, that our fathers founded, that Jefferson framed, that Madison planned, that Monroe philosophized about, dead, and does a new America, no longer a dual confederated Republic, but a single great Nation, headed by a single great Chief, whose power is greater to-day than that of any potentate on this earth, certainly, at least, among civilized nations, stand before us? Senators, I hope not. I fear that if that day shall ever come, it will prove fatal to the liberties of the Republic. To prove to you that this jeremiad is not so much a personal view of mine, I want to read to you what a distinguished American really thinks on this great question, or at least what he once thought on this great question. Let me quote from one of his books:

If the jealousies of the Colonies and of the little States which sprang out of them had not obliged the makers of the Constitution to leave the greater part of legal regulation in the hands of the States, it would have been wise, it would even have been necessary, to invent such a division of powers as was actually agreed upon. It is not, at bottom, a question of sovereignty or of any other political abstraction; it is a question of vitality. Uniform regulation of the economic conditions of a vast territory and a various people like the United States would be mischievous, if not impossible.

The statesmanship which really attempts it is premature and unwise. Undoubtedly the recent economic development of the country, particularly the development of the last two decades, has obliterated many boundaries, made many interests national and common which until our own day were separate and local; but the lines of these great changes we have not yet clearly traced or studiously enough considered. To distinguish them and provide for them is the task which is to test the statesmanship of our generation; and it is already plain that, great as they are, these new combinations of interest have not yet gone so far as to make the States mere units of local government. Not our legal conscience merely, but our practical interests as well, call upon us to discriminate and be careful, with the care of men who handle the vital stuff of a great constitutional government.

The United States are not a single, homogeneous community. In spite of a certain superficial sameness which seems to impart to Americans a common type and point of view, they still contain communities at almost every stage of development, illustrating in their social and economic structure almost every modern variety of interest and prejudice, following occupations of every kind, in climates of every sort that the Temperate Zone affords. This variety of fact and condition, these substantial economic and social contrasts, do not in all cases follow State lines. They are often contrasts between region and region rather than between State and State. But they are none the less real, and are in many instances permanent and ineradicable.

It would be fatal to our political vitality really to strip the States of their powers and transfer them to the Federal Government. It can not be too often repeated that it has been the privilege of separate development secured to the several regions of the country by the Constitution, and not the privilege of separate development only, but also that other more fundamental privilege that lies back of it, the privilege of independent local opinion and individual conviction, which has given speed, facility, vigor, and certainty to the processes of our economic and political growth.

To buy temporary ease and convenience for the performance of a few great tasks of the hour at the expense of that would be to pay too great a price and to cheat all generations for the sake of one.

Those words are worthy of the pen of Thomas Jefferson himself. Thomas Jefferson never wrote with more clearness, with more vigor, and with more strength of the blessings of local self-government, as handed down to us from our English forbears. Those words came from the pen of Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States. May God keep him, in this hour of his responsibility, steadfast to the faith that he once professed and which is vital to the life and safety of this Republic.

Mr. President, I can not support this bill. I would do so if I thought there was no other way to preserve the railroads of this country in all their vigor for the use of the Government in this hour of its national trial; but, convinced as I am that it could have been done in a much better way, in a much easier way, and that it can yet be done in both a better way and an easier way—of course, I speak only for myself; Senators who are not so convinced will, I can quite understand, support this bill, even if their general ideas are in accord with mine—but laboring under the convictions that I have expressed to you, it will be impossible for me to vote for a bill that I regard as wholly unnecessary and as equally unwise.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, every phase of the subject matter under consideration has been so completely and exhaustively discussed by Senators who have preceded me that I deem it almost a matter of supererogation for me to have anything whatever to say upon this bill. On account of the limited time fixed by the rule of the Senate I shall speak but briefly, indulging perhaps in the discussion of general principles and leaving the details of the measure to be treated by the able Senators in charge of the bill.

I have listened with interest unabated to the able speeches that have been delivered by learned Senators upon the pending measure. Its magnitude and the far-reaching importance of the problem have called forth their best efforts, which are illuminating contributions to the legislative literature of America. It has been particularly interesting to observe the learned Senators who chose to travel the old beaten path of political orthodoxy, spice their arguments with new thoughts, employ unusual phrases, and use language which gave a trite old issue the appearance of a new plan. Other able Senators, playing the rôle of protagonists, have essayed to wander into the field of imagery and speculation, pictured in vivid colors conditions which will prevail throughout the world when their theory shall be tested and approved, and when the storm clouds shall have drifted away and the sunlight of peace again fill this war-cursed world.

While I have enjoyed and cheerfully acknowledge myself the debtor of the distinguished Senators for the great speeches delivered on this question—speeches well worthy of the Senate in its best days—I wish particularly to pay the tribute of my gratitude and approval to the learned junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], the affluence of whose eloquence and the cogency of whose logic touched the high-water mark of senatorial debate, and will, I am sure, cause a feeling of despair to overcome those who may follow him in the discussion of this great problem. The soundness of his argument, the breadth of vision, the accuracy of his logical processes made captive the judgment of his listeners and commanded my heartiest approval. He has blazed the way that the progressive statesmanship of America will follow, and although he stands with a small group of statesmen about him to-day, the doctrine he so eloquently announces will within a few years, I trust, become the faith of an enlightened Nation.

Mr. President, the marked distinguishing difference between the man of genius and the ordinary plodding, slow-thinking individual whose mind is filled with the undigested thoughts and facts of others, is, the man of genius is able to dip into the future as far as human eye can see; he is able to stand within the shadow of the evening and look beyond the night into the morro , and with trance-prophetic eyes read the finished story and contemplate with pleasure the consummation of the centuries while the plodder sees and understands only the things of to-day. It is the difference between true greatness and groveling mediocrity.

Mr. President, the world is passing through a period of change—mutations and multiplied mutations follow in rapid succession. Things are happening to-day with a suddenness and passing on with such velocity, the slow-thinking person can only stand and wonder what is coming next.

War is the pregnant womb of perplexing problems which issue forth with fearful fecundity, and the attempted solution of which will lead the statesman in his investigations into all the avenues and ramifications of human actualities. The old landmarks have been torn down. The buoys that marked the channel of the sea have been swept from their anchorage by the storm of a world-wide conflict. There is no tried rule, no tested formula, and no friendly milepost to guide us along to the sure and better way.

We have entered new fields, adopted a new diplomacy, altered our relations, changed our attitude to the nations of the world, which we have maintained since the birth of the Republic. Verily—

> New conditions teach new duties;
> Time makes ancient good uncouth.

Never in the history of mankind was there so great a need or so pressing a demand for the services of great, wise, and good statesmen as now. We need men of courage and intellect—men morally and mentally strong. We need men of independence of thought, of ripe statesmanship and great learning, to meet and solve the onrushing, untried issues that confront us. We realize that "he is next to God whom reason and not passion impels," who is able at all times to preserve his moral equilibrium and mental poise, to serve the public although it may involve a personal sacrifice, and who will spurn with contumely the opportunities that lead to personal aggrandizement or private pecuniary fortune at the public expense—men who, after weighing the facts in all circumstances, will be able to shape their conduct so as to square it with patriotic discretion. It is a time to pause, to look and listen—to move cautiously, but to move. Heroic action above all things is required at this time. The steady light of popular judgment is needed as never before to illuminate the strange, shadowed roads over which we must travel. I have always believed that in the multitude of counsel there is wisdom. It is, therefore, in my judgment, important in these unusual times to have the utmost freedom of speech, freedom of thought, and freedom of action.

I have infinite faith in the saving grace of the honesty and patriotism of the American people. And I know the most dangerous class of men in this Republic, be they in private life or public station, are the egotistical, self-satisfied, self-worshiping, intolerant individuals who have no conception of their own limitations.

Torquemada was doubtless an honest man; he was sincere; he felt that his life was consecrated to the service of the Savior of mankind. He held to the view that men think and believed as they would and not as they must, and therefore he believed it were better to subject a finite creature to the most cruel punishment in order to save that creature from infinite damnation. I have no doubt that he thought that the auto dafe was a divine ceremony. And yet, in the light of modern civilization, who will defend its barbarities?

The effort to muzzle the press and the manifest disposition on the part of a few to intimidate private individuals who dare express their honest thoughts regarding their Government and the conduct of their hired public servants are so utterly at variance with the genius of our institutions that it ought not to be tolerated in this Republic for a moment.

Mr. President, men and women born of free Caucasian parents will not long remain calm and quiescent under such restraint. You can not make an American white man a subject in one generation; but if you could, it would be disastrous to free institutions. Such things will be looked upon by the wise and patriotic men and women in America in the years to come, when reason resumes its sway, with a deep sense of humiliation and regret. We have already seen the evil effects of an unwarranted censorship. The exigencies of war necessarily bring about a change in our Government which amounts almost to a change of polity. I agree with Dean Swift, "that it may pass for a maxim in state that the administration can not be placed in too few hands nor the legislature in too many." And this is especially true in time of war. There must be concentration of power. But it is possible to concentrate too much power even in time of war, powers that will ultimately, if not properly hedged about with limitations, overthrow Republican principles and destroy Democratic policies, especially if the powers thus conferred are conferred upon bureaus or individuals in whose own conceit there is no idea of the limitation of their own mentality.

There has been but one infallible man that ever lived upon this earth, and he was crucified 2,000 years ago. And he was crucified by the spiritual bigot, the mental coward—the servile tool of despotic power.

Hero worship has been the cause of more people losing their liberties than any other one error into which man has fallen. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty to-day just as much as it was when Patrick Henry fired the hearts of the colonists more than one and a quarter centuries ago with the dramatic statement, "Give me liberty or give me death." I believe in the composite wisdom of the masses. It is my judgment that all the people have more sense, and I would rather trust their conclusions and feelings in the matter of legislating for their benefit than to trust the judgment or the logical processes of any one man or coterie of men. The most just and rational laws written upon the statute books are public opinion crystallized. Public opinion is the salubrious salt breeze that neutralizes the poisonous effluvia which rises from the miasmatic swamps of political corruption. As the persistent blowing of the winds from the southwest create that mysterious current in the sea known as the Gulf Stream which carries into the very heart of the Arctic the genial cordial climate of the Tropics, so public sentiment arising from the attrition of ideas, the friction of suggestion, the exchange of experiences in everyday affairs of men and women create an influence that moves irresistibly to the Capitol of the Nation, and there, if the statesmen are wise, will find crystallization in public statutes, statutes which will partake of the moral qualities and intellectual acquirements of the people and will therefore be responsive to their private and public necessities. The future of this Republic depends upon the honesty, the fearlessness, the patriotism, and the intelligence of the individual men and women who compose the citizenship of the Nation. It is an influence that the statesmen can not with prudence ignore. It is dangerous to overlook it.

Mr. President, the pending bill has for its purpose the rendering of a great service to the world at this particular time. I commend most heartily the prudence and wisdom of the erudite Chief Executive in taking over the railroads of the United States for the purpose of expediting and facilitating the movement of troops and munitions of war and at the same time carrying on the commerce of the Nation. I believe the end so necessary to be reached will be attained by this extraordinary step.

It is my deliberate judgment that the most important and difficult problem which we have to solve in winning this war is the matter of land and ocean transportation. In carrying out this great undertaking I shall esteem it a privilege as well as a patriotic duty to give the President my most cordial support in the performance of the great function which he has assumed. In addition to the advantage which the American people will derive from the President's action in this behalf, I hope and believe it will lead finally to Government ownership and Government operation of the railroads of the entire country. It will afford a practical test of the theory I have long approved. To my mind, Government ownership of these essential public utilities will come when the American people realize that governments are made for men rather than men for governments. It will come as surely as right shall triumph over wrong and truth prevail against error.

The cruel cupidity of the conscienceless few who have controlled the press, the molders of public thought, are responsible for its failure of consummation years ago.

These views I have entertained for many years, and therefore I shall watch with great interest the process and the fruition of a cherished hope. But however much I desire to see the Government become the possessor of all the railroads, I am opposed to any legislation of that character being enacted at this time. Indeed, Mr. President, I shall oppose any legislation of a permanent character at this time, because I do not think the public mind is really sane. The whole world is daft, crazed with a blood lust, and the greed for gain has poisoned the hearts of our people. Let us enact legislation necessary to meet the present emergencies, and after the war is over we may then with safety undertake the difficult task of building for the future.

A fevered brain is a veritable Pandora's box of perplexities, and I would not open that box now. My investigations into the shipbuilding industries of the United States, the Hog Island infamy, for instance, together with the question of the shortage of coal and scarcity of sugar, have led me into the various fields of industry and governmental war enterprises, and it is a lamentable fact, which I state with regret and shame for my fellow countrymen. I find the slimy trail of the serpent of greed somewhere in all the preparations for war.

There seems to have grown up on the part of some a passion for plunder and an insatiable greed for graft. We find that men of prominence in high finance—men who were loudest in their demands for "preparedness" a few years ago, who paid for the bunting that decorated the houses, paid for the flags that were flaunted in the air by the hired claquers, paid for the bands that led the "preparedness" parade; these men who were loudest in their denunciation of the Members of Congress who dared to insist that a fair share of the war profits be devoted to paying the expenses of the war—the same hypocritical, lying plutocratic patriots for perquisites wrap themselves in the American flag and with the words of patriotism upon their mendacious lips would rob the Government in contracts or otherwise and thereby impose burdens upon posterity that will bring squalor to the home of the laborer and shadow the future of the children of the toilers yet unborn with blighting poverty, frustrated ambitions, and commit them to lives of dull, debasing drudgery. Down all the stretches of hell to its last gulf there is nothing more shocking to the moral sensibilities of a patriotic citizen.

Mr. President, I realize that war is expensive; expensive in blood, expensive in treasure. I understand as one who has contributed personally to the toll this brutal business demands—I know that war means sacrifice, self-abnegation, patriotic endeavor, the noblest qualities of the human soul. I understand it means all that and more; it arouses the most brutal instincts of the human race.

I believe in doing justice to the man who sows, and I insist also upon the maintenance of the rights of the man who reaps. I believe it is just as wrong to rob the railroad magnate or the railroad corporation as it is to rob the engineer or the fireman or the patient toiler who lays the track. My only desire is that justice be done, and I am quite earnestly of the opinion that it is as wrong to rob the laborer as it is to rob the capitalist.

Now, in the matter of compensating the railroads for services which they are to render under Government control, I can not apprehend, I can not follow, the mental or moral processes of the men who would urge that they be especially paid for their services to their country or for the use of their property in this great emergency. There is no divinity that hedges about railroad securities. I am unable to find anything sacred about railroad bonds or railroad stocks that would entitle them to be preferred or favored in the way of securing larger dividends than other forms of property.

I had a letter a few days ago from a young man telling me he had to give up a profitable grocery business because his country called him to arms. He had no one to whom he could trust the management of his business while he is in the Army, so he sold it at a sacrifice, and went forth to do and, if need be, to die in defense of the flag.

Another young man, a farmer in my State, with a wife and little child, who owns a small farm, was conscripted. There was a scarcity of labor in that community. He could not rent his place and he was unable to employ labor to cultivate it. So he wrote to me that the prospects were that the land would lie fallow for the next year, but the brave, patriotic fellow gave it all up and left his loving wife and child to the tender care of relatives and friends and went forth in response to his country's call. The Government has not taken any thought or granted any especial protection or exemption to men of that character and it is not expected that the Government should do more than it has done. But the railroads are to be shown special favors—they are permitted to make and enjoy the same average profits they made during the years 1915, 1916, and 1917, the fattest years in the life of the railroad business in America. While everybody else is called upon to make the supreme sacrifice, these corporations for profit are to enjoy the favors of normal times. I am told, Mr. President, that this policy must be pursued with reference to corporations—that they must have dividends upon their stock during the war or they will not play the game. If that be true, it is lamentable, for the Republic is in a desperate strait when the corporations must be hired to perform their patriotic duty to the Nation in time of war by money wrung from the taxpayers of the realm and the soldiers conscripted to defend the flag. I hope the corporations will not maintain that attitude to this Government. If they should, I shall be the last man with my vote to humor such a criminal caprice or temporize with such indefensible greed for gain, and I will not consent that Congress shall by its vote indorse such a policy.

No, Mr. President, I can not understand the reasoning of Senators which leads them to that conclusion to which the committee bill brings us. When the able and learned Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] talks of "stabilizing values of railroad securities" by the payment of undeserved dividends, he seems to forget that the extension of favors of this character to the railroads will be a gross, palpable, and inexcusable injustice to the men who compose the Army and their families and loved ones at home who must pay the taxes from which the dividends shall be taken. I believe the railroads ought not to have the profits that they would ordinarily make under war conditions after they shall have made the sacrifices that other industries and all the people have suffered. But they are entitled to no more. The maxim, "Equal and exact justice to all and special privileges to none," is the rule that ought to guide the statesman in the performance of the functions of his place, and especially in the treatment of this question. But it is urged that if we do not provide that the President may contract with the railroads for the dividends permitted in this bill that the railroads will go into the courts and after protracted litigation get a judgment against the Government for the use of their property which, it is urged, may be more than the maximum fixed in this bill. I do not believe anything of the kind possible. I do not believe that any judge or jury, with judicial knowledge of the conditions as they are would ever hold that the railroads were entitled to normal profits in abnormal times. The judgment of the court will be rendered upon facts and conditions that prevail at the time the Government incurred the liability and the reward of the railroads will be fixed by the average profits which other industries and other people received. For the railroads to ask for more would be the acme of injustice.

It is said that the saving under the Cummins resolution is small—only a couple hundred million dollars, an inconsequential amount. Mr. President, if that be true, if the amount is so small, the railroads ought not to demand it. On the other hand, the taxpayers of this country, who have borne the heavy burden of taxation until it has created "set fast" upon their tired backs, will be glad to receive any concession in the way of lightening the load, however small it may be. I am going to vote for the Cummins amendment and I hope sincerely it may be agreed to by the Senate. I believe that it comes more nearly dealing out justice to all parties concerned—to the railroads and the taxpayers alike. And, Mr. President, may I be permitted to say in conclusion that it is my deliberate judgment that if we would bring all the people of America to the support of the Government with enthusiasm, verve, and deathless determination to win this war nothing will contribute more to bring about that great desideratum than to impress the public mind—the man who toils—with the fact that we are not playing favorites; that equal and exact justice to all shall be done, alike to the rich and the poor, the weak and the strong.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, from this time forward until 6 p. m. of this evening arguments by Senators will be confined to 10 minutes each upon the bill and any amendment offered thereto. The bill is in the Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] by reason of illness.

Mr. MYERS. On account of the continued illness of my colleague [Mr. WALSH], he is unable to be present.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce for the day the absence of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], caused by personal illness. I ask to have this announcement apply to future roll calls.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] offers an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 17, at the end of the sentence, after the word "included," it is proposed to insert a colon and the following words:

Provided, That the standard return to any such carrier whose average rate of net income to capital stock for the years aforesaid has been more than 5 per cent shall not exceed the net railway operating income for the calendar year 1917 after deducting therefrom the amount available out of earnings for investment and surplus: Provided further, That the last preceding limitation shall not be employed so as to reduce the net income (above all operating expenses, taxes, interest, and all other fixed charges) of any such carrier below the amount required to meet each year the regular dividend accruals on all capital stock outstanding December 31, 1917. The surplus over and above the standard return as so computed shall be paid into the revolving fund hereafter created, and such part thereof as may be necessary shall be used in additions, betterments, and extensions to said property. All of said property constructed out of or purchased by the same shall belong to, and shall be held in trust for, the public, and no return to any railway company shall ever be paid thereon.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if Senators will give me their attention, I will adhere strictly to the issue presented in the amendment just offered.

I have already at considerable length expressed my views with regard to the standard proposed in the bill; and I have already laid before the Senate with fullness, and I hope with accuracy, what the standard proposed in the bill will do for the railroads which are affected by the amendment I have offered. I do not intend to repeat the argument I made with regard to the effect of the bill as it is upon these roads.

The amendment which I have offered affects 86 of the more than 1,000 railroads in the United States. It does not affect any others. As to all the remaining roads and systems the compensation remains precisely as it is proposed in the bill.

For instance, this amendment does not affect any roads in New England except two small ones. It does not affect the New York, New Haven & Hartford, or the Boston & Maine, or others of a similar character that I might mention. It affects two small railroads in New England. It does not include such roads as the Erie, the Southern, the Rock Island, the Chicago & Alton, the Great Western, the Missouri Pacific, the Missouri, Kansas & Texas, the St. Louis & San Francisco, the Denver & Rio Grande, or the Western Pacific; and I might mention a great many others, but it is unnecessary. I want the Senate to understand that I have segregated, for the application of my amendment, 86 roads which are named in the table which was appended to my remarks the other day.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator give the names of the two roads in New England that are affected?

Mr. CUMMINS. My recollection is that the Maine Central and the Central of New England are the two roads that would be slightly affected by the amendment I have offered.

My statement with respect to the guaranteed income of these 86 roads has not been controverted, nor can it be controverted, because I simply laid before the Senate the results of an investigation of the Interstate Commerce Commission—an investigation made entirely, I assume, from a disinterested standpoint.

The roads in the eastern district affected by the amendment, which under the standard of the bill will have a net income of from 6 to 600 per cent, have an average net income upon capital stock of 11.48 per cent. The roads in the southern district within my amendment having a net income of from 5½ to 50 per cent average 12.37 per cent. The roads in the western district coming within the amendment with net incomes as compared with their capital stock of from 6 to 160 per cent average 9.96 per cent. The purpose of my amendment is to reduce this net income, and as compared with the standard return proposed in the bill, the aggregate reduction in the eastern district will be $65,205,667, the reduction in the southern district will be $35,659,207, and the reduction in the western district will be $72,209,538—a total of $173,000,000 for the 86 systems which I have named—and it will be understood, of course, that this is a reduction of the annual compensation of that amount.

Now, with regard to the amendment. I have taken as the basis of the amendment the best year which these roads have ever had in all the history of transportation. I have taken as a further maximum the earnings for the year 1917. The amendment provides that from the net operating income which the bill proposes to guarantee to these roads there shall be deducted in each case the amount of earnings available for investment and surplus. That is, after the road has paid all its expenses of every kind, has paid its interest, has paid its taxes, has paid its dividends, that then the amount which is available for investment—that is, capital investment—and the amount which is available for surplus shall be deducted from the standard return or from the operating income in order to reach the guranteed amount which the Government proposes for these companies. But in order to make the conclusion beyond attack the amendment proceeds to say that in no event shall the guaranteed return be less than sufficient to pay the customary dividends of the roads named in the amedment.

I shall not pretend to read the customary dividends, for my time will soon expire. It is sufficient to say that the New York Central has customarily paid 5 per cent, the Pennsylvania 6 per cent. I think the Baltimore & Ohio 6 per cent, the Chicago & North Western 7 and 8 per cent—one upon preferred stock and one upon common—the Northern Pacific, I think, 7 per cent, the Great Northern 7 per cent, the Union Pacific, I think, 8 per cent, last year 10 per cent, and the Southern Pacific a like amount. I am simply instancing these things, Mr. President, to show that my amendment does not reduce the guaranteed return or income below the amount that these companies will require to pay every expense that can possibly be charged to them, and then pay the dividends which they have paid in times that are past; and any suggestion that under such a guaranty the stocks and bonds of these companies will not be fortified and strengthened and maintained in the market is purely imaginary.

I listened with profound interest to the brilliant eulogy pronounced upon railways and railway management by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. Some of it is very well founded. With some of it I could not agree. But what then? I care not how high may be the pedestal upon which we lift these heroes of the past—what has that to do with the question of compensation? It has no more to do with the fair value of these properties, or the fair value of the use of these properties, than the flowers that bloom in the spring.

I listened with emotion to the pathetic reference of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the great army of widows and orphans who own the railroads of the United States. I shall not pause to inquire just how extensive an interest the widows and orphans have in the railway property of this country, or how influential they are in its management. Let us grant it all. Let us grant that they own the railways; that all the orphans and all the widows are deeply concerned and deeply affected by what we do here—what then? I am no more in favor of giving a widow or an orphan an unfair, unjust, excessive compensation than I am in favor of giving a railway corporation or a millionaire an unjust or an excessive compensation. It is all wide of the mark. There have been drawn into this debate thousands of unrelated and immaterial conditions which ought not to be remembered when we are considering this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Iowa has expired:

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, while we are talking somewhat irrelevantly about things that are in themselves comparatively insignificant, I read in the cloakroom a moment ago an editorial from the New York Times of February 20, entitled "Lloyd-George triumphs again." It is tribute to that brilliant Welshman and a tribute to the war spirit and unity of action of the allied forces. I want the Secretary to read it as a part of my remarks before I go any further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

LLOYD-GEORGE TRIUMPHS AGAIN.

Our system of government organization has this advantage over the British system of ministerial responsibility, that we escape the peril of enforced changes of administration in the midst of war. We are not confronted by the grave risk of the transfer of power from one set of men to another, from one party to another, at a time when the whole power of the Nation, of all the parties and of all the people, must be exerted, without any hindrance from political squabbles, for the overthrow of the enemy. Our President, our Senators, our Congressmen are elected at fixed dates, not subject to change because of any vote of want of confidence in Congress, while the overthrow of a British ministry may involve an appeal to the country through a general election of members of the House of Commons. In time of war, at least, our system has many advantages.

Happily, Mr. Lloyd-George has again baffled those who would like to displace him, and he has delivered the United Kingdom from the very serious embarrassment of either a general election or of a change of ministry at this moment. By his explanation in the House of Commons yesterday of the resolve recently taken at Versailles he retains the confidence of the House and of the country. We hope that confidence in him has been confirmed, really strengthened. It is distasteful to many old-fashioned conservatives that a man of his earlier political professions should hold the chief post of power, but Lloyd-George has been a mighty instrument of war for the British Empire, and his countrymen know it. While Americans would wish to refrain from any expressions of partisanship or any undue partiality in British politics, it is undoubtedly true that the overthrow of the British ministry, of which Lloyd-George is at the head, would be regarded here with no little apprehension. His extraordinary intellectual force, his power in organization and direction, as well as the capacity he has shown in declarations of policy for the prosecution of the war, have won for him our confidence. We are glad that he retains the confidence of the British people, which is very much more important.

The prime minister's explanation of the decisions taken at Versailles is very simple; it is very much what was expected; the facts were, indeed, already pretty well known. In establishing a central authority "to coordinate the strategy of the allies," the war council merely accomplished the general desire, including America, as Mr. Lloyd-George pointed out. It is gratifying to know that this general principle had the unanimous assent of the members of the council. Differences arose, as was natural, over details. The agreement that there should be "an interallied authority with executive powers" was easily reached. It was less easy to secure unanimity about the constitution of the central authority. A question somewhat apart from this arose through displeasure over the proposed transfer of Gen. Sir William Robertson, chief of the imperial general staff, to a place in the supreme war council, which he declined to accept. There was some mystery about it which seems to be cleared up by the now general understanding that Gen. Robertson was not satisfied with modification of the plan in force under which he issued orders without first submitting them to the army council or to the secretary of war. His feeling of dissatisfaction has been appeased, however, and he accepts the new post to which he has been assigned.

Political rivalries and ambitions have played a large part in the recent attacks upon the Lloyd-George ministry. We suppose expressions of regret in this country and in Paris that the passions and issues of party politics should be allowed to impair in any degree that unity of resolve and of effort which is essential to the success of the allies may have been heard in London. The newspaper campaign against the prime minister appears to have been actuated by a very different motive from that which has prompted recent criticisms here of the administration at Washington.

The result was an illuminating example of the successful working of our Government system. No high officer was displaced, but the men in high places responded by an instant compliance with the popular demand. There were reorganizations, efforts at coordination, new and strong men were called in as aids and the administration itself asked Congress to enact a measure which would increase its authority and make possible a more effective exercise of its powers. The war machine was strengthened, and criticism ceased because it had accomplished the end sought.

There was far less admixture of partisanship here than in the movement against Lloyd-George, and the motive of pacifism, of opposition to a determined prosecution of the war was altogether absent, which was not quite the case in England. The result, however, is satisfactory there, as it is here. Mr. Lloyd-George is sustained, our administration is better organized for its work, and both Governments can devote their energies to the business of chastising the enemy of civilization with full confidence that they have the united support of the peoples behind them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there are two real great forces in the international arena right now. One of them is Lloyd-George, representing Great Britain and world democracy; the other is Woodrow Wilson, representing America and world democracy. This tribute to Lloyd-George which has just been read was his triumph over the discontented members of the Parliament of Great Britain, who were objecting to his favoring a central military staff for harmony of purpose and unity of action with all the allies. Lloyd-George and Woodrow Wilson both agreed, as they ought to have agreed, that we ought to fight the Central Empires—Mittel-Europa, as the Germans call it—not with five distinct forces but with one force. Harmony of purpose, unity of action, concentration of effort. This is the result in Great Britain. I have had it read because I want it to have its effect upon the Members of the legislative body of this Federal Union.

If with the power to remove Lloyd-George he won his way out upon this policy, then the President of the United States ought to be supported by this national legislative body, in spite of the fact that he has no way of coming to them and laying down the gauntlet and saying: "Attack me if you dare; go to the public in a general election if you dare. Stop your little bit of wasp stinging and muckraking, wherever you are delivering them. I challenge you to the combat now."

The President of the United States has no such power. He has no such privilege and it is a privilege. Lloyd-George had it. He threw the gauntlet down to the Parliament, or to the men who had been muckraking and the men who had been politics playing and wasp stinging, and said: "Here I am. If I and my administration do not suit you, get another; but while I am here I propose to do my duty as I understand it, not as you understand it."

I wish to God that the President of the United States had the privilege of coming before the Congress of the United States and saying just what Lloyd-George did to the Parliament of Great Britain. I do not care about these little discussions as to what amount of income some corporation is to get here or there or on the other side; neither does anybody else care a cent about it, contrasted with this great question of winning the war. The great question before us is to win this war.

If there be Germans with the brains of Robert E. Lee or of the Duke of Marlborough, they will give us a heap of trouble, because there is a chance of breaking through the Italian front and attacking France in the rear, and having the balance of us retreat from the continent of Europe. While that is going on over there you are tweedledumming and tweedledeeing here about the verbiage of a bill. Thank God Lloyd-George did not have to tweedledum nor tweedledee, and I wish to God that the President of the United States did not have to do it through his Cabinet, through his spokesmen on this floor, whoever they are—I do not know; I am not one of them. I wish to God that he had the privilege of coming directly as the prime minister of Great Britain and the real chief executive—because the King merely reigns; he does not rule—has the privilege there. I wish to God that he had this power of coming to us, and I want to say it seems to me that the American people are expecting you and me to get through with these appropriations, to get through with these necessary war measures, and then to go home and stay there as long as we can. Here are a whole lot of investigations started.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me finish this sentence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What effect has been achieved by them except to disturb a few American mothers and wives and put the seed of pessimism in their bosoms and to encourage our enemies—no other effect.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this bill is a measure of vast and immense importance and requires the exercise of our best thought before we shall crystallize it into a statute. I shall not attempt to discuss it in the short space of time to which I am limited by the unanimous-consent rule. That has been done so much better than I can that were I to attempt it I could but supplement what has been so much better stated.

But, Mr. President, I want to express myself briefly regarding one or two of the principal features of the bill. I have long ago reached the conclusion that Government control or possibly Government ownership may be the only alternative to the solution of our various transportation problems, but I do not think that an emergency war measure should be made the vehicle for such legislation or for any legislation not absolutely essential to the present emergency.

The President took possession of the railway systems of the country under the act of August 29, 1916. That act limits his possession to the duration of the war, when, unless we otherwise provide, the control of these systems will automatically be restored to their owners.

Now that is the tenure of possession which he has and the only tenure which he can defend. Legislation now being enacted should, in my judgment, confine itself to that emergency and should not embrace subjects brought in and attached to the measure, thus making it a vehicle for legislation designed to be permanent in its character, and which the deliberate judgment of the people may not approve. A bill of this character should contain nothing regarding the time to which governmental possession should extend after the end of the war.

Therefore that section of the bill designed to extend Government control to 18 months after the end of the war should not, in my judgment, be adopted, for it is out of harmony with the general purpose of the bill.

Mr. President, another feature of this bill to which I will briefly refer relates to rates of transportation. It is foreign to the purpose of the bill and should not be in it. What right have we—what exigency exists to justify giving to the President or any other individual or official the power to initiate rates? It will be observed that that power is not limited to the duration of the war, but if there is to be a general extension of this possession, of course that power should govern until repealed by subsequent legislation.

But even if it were an emergency need, I should hesitate before voting to place such a power in other than the hands where it has rested for years and where the power has been properly exercised.

The pretense made during the last year or two that higher rates were necessary to save our roads from bankruptcy is wholly untrue. That is demonstrated to be the fact by the returns which we are to use as the average of the compensation to be granted to the railroads under Government control, which disclose that in 1916 and 1917, when the clamors of the roads for higher rates were greater and louder than ever and the pressure upon the Interstate Commerce Commission was more severe, they earned more money than they ever made annually in all the history of transportation.

Why under such circumstances is it necessary either to require the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other body or any other official to change rates? Why endow them with the power of initiating other rates which will be enhanced if a change is made?

Mr. President, one more word and I must yield the floor. I am sorry the Senators were not in their seats day before yesterday to listen to the discussion of this bill and the proposed substitute by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I am sure you would have been convinced had you been here, as I was, that the substitute he has offered is absolutely essential to clarify and make intelligent the bill reported by the committee. That is making no reflection upon the committee. It has unquestionably done the best it could in the time at its disposal; but the Senator from Michigan has told us the bill was not prepared by any member of the committee, it was prepared upon the outside and sent to it, and the committee has doubtless been too busy listening to testimony and holding its sessions to closely consider the phraseology of the bill. There are serious defects of expression regarding many of its vital features.

The Senator from Michigan offers no new suggestions. He introduces nothing of a novel character in the bill or differing materially from that which has been reported. He points out its verbal imperfections and its very serious defects, and asks that the bill shall be so changed in its phraseology as to recite what we want to express, and thus avoid appeals to the courts.

If his substitute is rejected I shall later on offer a number of specific amendments to the bill as reported out of committee.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the Senate for a moment while I explain, in a few words, what I believe this amendment would accomplish.

You will remember that under section 5 of the bill the railroads are permitted to pay their regular dividends that they paid for the last three years. The effect of this amendment is, in substance, to take all the income above the dividends and turn it over to the Government and make it Government money and make it a part of the revolving funds, and if loaned to the railroads they must pay back with interest.

Now, the effect would be this: The railroads would pay the same dividends. That would be their standard return. They could not receive one dollar above the dividends they have paid for the last three years. No railroad in the world can live any number of years if it has no income to invest in betterments and improvements above its dividends. It is perfectly clear that there are hundreds of millions of improvements made upon the railroads, and sometimes they amount to hundreds of millions in one year. They are of a class which do not pay a return to the railroad company, like new stations and elevated tracks and many other improvements which the public demands and is entitled to, but which do not return any revenue to the character.

I do not believe that the company should be held down to the exact amount of dividends which they have paid during the last three years. Let me illustrate it by some of the cases mentioned by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. Take the New York Central. It has paid for many years 5 per cent upon its stock. It has earned sometimes 1 and sometimes 3 or 4 and sometimes 5 per cent more than that, and that money has been invested in improvements and betterments, the same as it has on other roads in this country. The President would take every dollar above the 5 per cent from the New York Central Road, and he could loan it to a broken-down railroad, like the Western Pacific or the Missouri Pacific, or some other company. I do not believe that that is fair.

Now, take the Burlington, about which so much has been said. It is said in the tables presented by the senior Senator from Iowa that this return would give about 22 per cent. I believe, however, that is based on the two best years, and two years only, but it did not pay 20 or 22 per cent. As a matter of fact, the Burlington has paid 8 per cent on its capitalization of $110,000,000, and the balance of its income has been invested in improvements and betterments. The total capitalization of the Burlington Road's stock and bonds is less than $30,000 a mile. Nobody would claim that the Burlington Road is not worth more than that.

Mr. REED. Mr President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield for a question.

Mr. REED. Just for a question. Does the Senator wish us to understand that the Cummins amendment proposes to take the earnings of one railroad and turn them over to another railroad?

Mr. KELLOGG. The President could do that, because they are now a part of the revolving fund, and he may advance that money to any road he sees fit. He may take the earnings of one road and loan them to another.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KELLOGG. I can not yield. My time is very short.

The amendment of the Senator from Iowa does not equalize the compensation of the railroads any more than the bill does. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa gives each road the dividends that it has paid. The same equality of rates to the stockholders is preserved in his amendment as that he complains of in the bill, but it does confine the railroad's earning the standard returns to the dividends it has paid during the last five years.

It is said that these earnings are unequal. I am not going into the details of that question. They are no more unequal than the dividends which have been paid. For instance, under this amendment, if a railroad had paid 2 per cent or 3 per cent, but had earned 5½ per cent, its standard return is only 2 or 3 per cent, and the balance over and above 2 or 3 per cent which it expended would be taken from that railroad, and if it is loaned back to it, it must pay it back to the Government and pay interest upon it, and it can not use its own money for purposes of capitalization. I do not claim that incomes should be capitalized above a reasonable return upon the capital, but in a case like that it would be great injustice to a road only paying 2 per cent.

It was impossible for the committee to equalize the payment to stockholders on all the roads of the United States. We have not the power to do it if we had had the time to inquire into each railway property. We could not say just what should be paid to a railroad company for the use of its property. As has been said here, that is a judicial question. All we did do was this: To say that the President might negotiate an agreement. But rather than let the President go to a higher figure than the average of the last three years' net earnings of the railroads we would compel a railroad to go into the court.

Between the highest point between these average earnings and other lower point we authorize the President to negotiate.

As I said before, the tables submitted by the senior Senator from Iowa, which are contained on pages 2199, 2200, and 2201 of the RECORD, are not tables of the dividends the railroads have paid during the last three years and which under this bill they would be authorized to pay to their stockholders. They can not pay any greater dividends than they paid in the last three years. Those tables represent the entire net earnings of the railroad companies above the interest upon their bonded debt if paid out to the stockholders in dividends.

But as I said before, it is impossible for the railroad companies of this country or any other country to pay out of their net income any dividends. It would bankrupt any railroad in 10 years.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], in substance, to state that the proposition contained in the Cummins amendment is to take the earnings from successful roads and turn a part of those earnings over to unsuccessful roads. I do not get that meaning out of the amendment; but I want to ask the Senator from Iowa what is his construction of the amendment in respect to which I have just referred?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in no sense does the amendment do what the Senator from Missouri understood the Senator from Minnesota to say. I really did not understand the Senator from Minnesota quite to affirm that proposition. We are guaranteeing to the roads a certain income, and all that the property earns above that income is not railroad money; it is Government money. The only difference between my amendment and the bill in that respect is that I prescribe a different income—a lesser income—with regard to certain roads; and the surplus above that no more belongs to the railroads than the furniture in this Chamber belongs to the railroads. It belongs to the Government of the United States, and the Government can do whatsoever it pleases with it.

Mr. REED. Does not the surplus which would come from the roads that are covered by the Senator's amendment take exactly the same course as the surplus from other roads?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. REED. Then the only thing the Senator's amendment does is to put a limit upon the profits of certain roads that will receive very high compensation?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. REED. I thought that was the situation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think, in justice to the committee, it ought to be brought to the attention of the Senate that, from the use of expressions on the floor, the public and perhaps some Members of the Senate are getting the idea that the Government is going to pay the railroads a certain amount. The truth is that the Government is not proposing under this bill to pay anything at all. What it proposes to do is this: In the emergency certain railroad corporations and organizations, comprising in their entirety the railroad systems of this country, are essential, under the new order of things, for the proper prosecution of the war. That new order, in the wisdom of the President, was for him to take control of their operation. That contemplates that the same ownership shall still exist; that the same employees and operatives shall still be employed. We say to the railroads: "We shall assume Government control and allow you to make the same amounts that you have been making on the average for three years; and if, under Government control, we make more than you have been making, we will put it into the Treasury; but if, under our management or mismanagement, there is a loss, we will assume it." But not one dollar is pledged out of the Treasury, save to make good the loss that might accrue under Government management.

There have grown up surpluses in some of the roads, but they grew up, not by any power on the part of those roads to profiteer, because we have had them in the rigid grip of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, under the act of 1910, was given the power to say how much any and every road in this country in the maximum should earn.

I have taken some time to look into the question of rate structure, the long and short haul, joint rates, the equalizing of the opportunity for the commercial and business world, so that one road would not have too great an advantage over another. It is a delicate and difficult problem to work out. I believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the best information and light it has had, has, as well as it could under the law, worked out equality, as far as possible, between the public and those who own this property. Be that as it may, they worked it out under the sanction and by the power of the law which we enacted. In the emergency we took over these roads and said to them, "We want you still to operate the roads; we want you to do away with personal interest, with selfish interest, and to turn them into the hands of the great impartial Government of the United States, so that they may advantageously divert freight and so they may divert traffic."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have listened to this debate with great interest; and I have noticed that objection has been made by one Senator at least, and perhaps by more, that in determining the compensation of the roads the committee has taken two fat years—the years of the war—as the basis upon which to fix the compensation. I want to ask the Senator from South Carolina if it is not reasonable to suppose that, if the Government had not taken over these roads during the continuance of the war, the roads would, in all human probability, have earned as much as they did during the two years which have passed since the war commenced?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Why, as a matter of course, Mr. President, if the same conditions were to exist in 1918, in 1920, or in 1921 which existed in 1916 and 1917 the roads would be the beneficiaries of them.

But the point that I want to stress is the iteration and reiteration of the statement that we are going to pay the railroads exorbitant amounts of the people's money. You were doing this before the war; the railroads were not allowed to earn a dollar more during the war than they were earning before the war. The only excess profits they got were for excess services rendered by virtue of the war.

I hold no brief for the railroads. I am simply standing here trying, as an honest American citizen, to do justice under an emergency, and not to attempt to obtain goods under false pretenses. We have taken the roads over as we found them and as they were controlled by the laws that you and I enacted. The railroads were not earning a dollar more than the Interstate Commerce Commission allowed them to earn under congressional action. The only thing that we guarantee is that if under Government control there is a loss we will make it good. If there is a profit we will put it into the Treasury and say to them, "Go on and earn the average that you have earned for three years under Government control and under Government restrictive action."

I do not know whether or not the roads were making too much money or too little, and there is no man on this floor who knows. We have passed here a bill for the physical valuation of the roads. The committee called Judge Prouty in, and he said, "We expended $11,000,000 and have not secured information that is worth 1 cent to the committee." That is the situation. Men may assume knowledge here. As some one has said, "There is a great amount of conjecture that can be gotten out of mighty few facts." We do not know the value of the roads; we have had no way of finding out their value. The Interstate Commerce Commission has been allowing them a certain rate, which has been fixed after certain observations. The amount does not depend upon the capital stock or the real investment, but it depends upon what the commission believes to be a just, fair, and equitable rate, taking all the circumstances of commerce under consideration.

I will join the Senator from Iowa and will join the Senate, if I am fortunate enough to be alive and to be a Member of it when this emergency shall have passed, in taking up this problem and solving it once and for all; but I do submit that in the midst of this emergency, these corporations having earned what they did earn under the rules and laws passed by this body, it is not fair and it is not right to seize that property, and then, once it is in our hands, begin to say to them, either because of public opinion or because of any other coercive force, "We are going to dictate now what you shall have."

I thought that it was just to the committee to give what was the opinion of the committee after this question was debated and thrashed out there. I am not here pleading that the railroads should get what they are now getting, because I do not know that they should. It is a question of suspended judgment. I do not know what is just, because I do not know what it cost to build, maintain, and operate the roads, and nobody else does.

Any two corporations in a given territory can start out under identically the same conditions to build a railroad. One by shrewd executive ability and shrewd financing will build one road at a less cost than the other, but the roads will render the same service to the public, yet the cost of one differs from the cost of the other as the financial ability with which one is managed differs from the other. It is a complex problem; it is one that involves so many diverse elements that a majority of your committee, in all honesty, thought that with this emergency we should allow the railroads to earn the average of three years under the same conditions—the war conditions—under which we took them. Therefore I do not want it imputed to me that I am standing here to gouge out of the American people an unholy stipend.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, some of the discussion of this amendment seems to proceed on the idea that the money invested in the railways of this country is all public property; that it belongs to the Government. Essentially all of it, on the contrary, is a private investment impressed only with a public interest and subject to governmental control. Every share of railway stock in this country is as much private property, except as subject to regulation by law, as is industrial stock or real estate. It is subject, with certain other kinds of property, to governmental regulation; it has been impressed with that public interest from time immemorial under the English rule, from the days of the stage coaches that ran out of London, which were the original common carriers. All of them have been impressed with that interest and have been subject to governmental control. Railways are in that condition now. There is very little distinction in the discussion between control and regulation and there is less for future legislative purposes.

The majority of the committee faced the problem of what should be the basis of charging the Government for the temporary use during the war of this private property so subject to governmental control. If they had adopted the capital stock as the basis of compensation, they would necessarily have adopted the method of capitalizing nearly 1,300 individual railways in the United States with the good and the evil and with the sins and the virtues of that capitalization. They would have penalized every conservatively managed road and capitalizing process in the country, and would have put a premium upon every watering process that has been the subject of proper criticism here and elsewhere. So they finally took another basis, making it the operating income of the roads.

Being private property, I do not consider that anything above the standard return provided in section 1 belongs to the Government. The Government must pay for the use of the property, as a majority of the committee has wisely decided, on a given basis other than that of the earnings on the mere capital stock. Having done that, any surplus is the earnings for the stipulated time on private property, not on public property.

I am entirely oblivious to the claims made by many eminent public authorities and professors of economics who are engaged in a Bolsheviki campaign in this country, and have been for many years, without any general obvious understanding on the part of the public. Notwithstanding these distinguished gentlemen, this is all private property, and what it earns over and above the compensation paid by the Government belongs to the private-property interest.

I want to turn to a concern whose home office is in Chicago, which is known as the Illinois Central Railroad. This amendment would penalize the very conservative management of that road. It has never been a speculative road from the time in 1850 when Senator Douglas introduced a bill in the Senate, which finally passed, that made the land grant that was the basis of the road in the pioneer days. It has been a 7 or 8 per cent stock and has been considered as safe as any bank stock in the United States. That company has never passed a dividend since 1858 or 1859 from the time it began to operate its road. It has a conservative issue of stock and has never overestimated at all its property value. For instance, under the general-balance head of "Property owned and securities held in the treasury"—that is, of property and securities of subsidiary lines, which that road has bought and controls and operates and holds in its treasury—it is shown that these two items alone constitute a total of more than $276,000,000. It is further shown that it has a total property valuation of $304,000,000, with a stock issue on that property valuation of $109,000,000 and a bonded indebtedness of $154,000,000.

As to that road the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] would, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] suggests, work a gross injustice; it would establish a false standard. Their machinery becomes obsolete; they do not wear it out, but some one invents something else, and in the machine shops at the terminals machine after machine that cost thousands of dollars is discarded overnight because some invention has been perfected whose labor-saving features make it wise to discard and throw away the old machine and buy another that may cost twice as much as the old one. In the operating departments of all the great railways of the country instance after instance of that kind can be found. To cover this obsolete property, depreciation, and repairs to track facilities, structures, and appurtenances it is necessary that a surplus be continually set aside to meet emergencies. All that would be ignored by this amendment, and I think it would work a very grave injustice to the interests concerned.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] was correct in his construction of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], at least the conclusion which he drew was not unwarranted. The amendment provides on page 2:

> The surplus over and above the standard return as so computed shall be paid into the revolving fund hereafter created, and such part thereof as may be necessary shall be used in additions, betterments, and extensions to said property.

It will be remembered that under section 6 of the bill a revolving fund is to be created, to be used for the benefit of all the roads. If the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is to reduce the compensation of particular roads, it will also have the effect of increasing the amount that shall go to the benefit of the Government and into the revolving fund, and, notwithstanding the provision in the amendment that any sum that may be necessary shall be used for betterments and extensions on the particular roads earning the money, a portion of their earnings may be used on other roads, and such portion will be correspondingly increased as the amount of compensation awarded to particular roads is reduced.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose under the bill as it is the Pennsylvania Railroad were to earn a million dollars more than the standard return, what would become of that million dollars?

Mr. ROBINSON. It would undoubtedly go to the benefit of the Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. And could be used on other property?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but now, to carry the illustration further——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arkansas will allow me, if it is used on other property, that property would be charged with it, and it would be a debtor to the Government to that extent.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly. But now, to carry the illustration of the Senator from Iowa just a little further, suppose, for the sake of illustration, that we limited the amount of compensation to be awarded to these roads to 1 per cent, there would be an enormous fund which they had earned in the nature of a surplus which would be paid into the revolving fund, and it would not be necessary to use that fund or any considerable portion of it on the particular road earning it. Therefore, the remainder of it would be used for the benefit of other more improvident roads. So I maintain that the Senator from Missouri was correct in his implication in the question he asked the Senator from Iowa a few moments ago.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, in studying the features of the bill pertaining to the question of compensation I observe that the committee has not declined to attempt to adjust inequities on account of poor and inadequate income received by a railroad. The bill seems to take into consideration the fact that a railroad may be losing money, and if it has been losing money that then the Government should guarantee to it a reasonable compensation. I take the position, Mr. President, that if it is within the province of Congress to deal with the equities in the case of a railroad that is operating at a loss, then it is equally within the bounds of propriety for Congress to deal with the question of excess. I do not believe if any number of railroads have been making excess profits that when it comes to a question of Congress dealing with that subject then Congress should perpetuate those excesses.

If I understand the function of the Government in dealing with the railroad problem it is to do justice both to the railroads and to the patrons of the roads who furnish the sinews of war for their operation. If a number of the railroads of this country have been making excess profits during the past three years, then, performing the proper functions of government, I conceive it to be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce the rates to a point where they would only make reasonable compensation, instead of for Congress to give sanction to the excess profits that have been made heretofore. Therefore I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa will be adopted.

It is inevitable that if we put the railroads of this country that have been losing money upon a reasonable paying basis, and if we guarantee to the railroads that have been making excess profits a continuance of their excess profits, then there is going to be a deficit in the revenue, occasioned by the necessity of building up the railroad that is not making a profit, which will necessarily have to be raised by taxing the American people for that purpose, or else by raising rates. That is the proposition that confronts us. The people of this country will have to pay additional taxes in order that a certain class of our railroads shall continue to enjoy excess profits and in order that another class of railroads shall be put upon a paying basis, or else railroad rates will have to be increased.

I think, Mr. President, when we are dealing with the properties and the rights of the railroads and of the stockholders of the railroads—and I would not do them an injustice—we should also consider whether or not by our action we will impose an injustice upon the American people in enacting the proposed legislation. I submit, Mr. President, that for the Government to endeavor to place the entire railroad systems of our country on a paying basis and to permit certain systems to continue to receive excess incomes and to require that burden to be met by the American people either in the way of increased traffic rates or else by taxes which shall be levied upon them is favoritism to the railroad operators of this country and a discrimination against the American people who will have to bear the burden imposed on account of such action. So I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa will be adopted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the real import and purpose of the first section of this bill have been set forth a number of times already; but I think there is still some misapprehension as to the real status of the first section of the bill before the Senate, and therefore I am bold enough to restate it.

The question that confronts us is not the taking over of the railroads; they are already in the hands of the Government. The question before us is not the fixing of a just compensation for the property taken, because the courts have repeatedly held that that is a judicial function, and not a legislative function. We have no direct power to determine what is just compensation under the Constitution of the United States for the taking of these railroads by the Government. No matter what we might attempt to do in the way of legislation, it would fall into the wastebasket when it reached the Supreme Court of the United States, if we were to attempt to determine what is the fair compensation that should be paid for the use of the railroads during the life of this bill. Therefore the committee has attempted to do neither. It has not proposed legislation to take over the railroads; it has merely recognized, by the bill reported, an existing status. It has not in this bill attempted to determine what would be fair compensation to pay the railroads for the taking of their property, because there was not a question raised in the committee by any member of the committee, or by any man who appeared as a witness before the committee, that Congress had the power to determine what just compensation was. I think I can call on the distinguished Senator from Iowa, the proponent of this amendment, to justify my statement in that respect.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, unquestionably that is true. The section is confined to the matter of providing for agreements between the railroads and the Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, the issue before us at this time is in relation to the attempt on the part of Congress, responding to a request by the President of the United States, to provide the machinery by which the President can make agreements with the railroads as to what is just compensation, without forcing them to go to the courts to have the courts determine what the amount shall be. That is all that is involved in the first section—merely a question as to whether we will authorize the President to enter into agreements with the railroads before they go into court or whether we shall force them to go into court to get the just compensation for which the bill provides.

I do not combat a great deal of what the Senator from Iowa has said in reference to these matters, but I am not sure that either the Senator from Iowa or myself or any other Member of this body, if to-day we were sitting on a tribunal to determine what was just compensation to these railroads for their taking, would be prepared to determine that matter now and find a just verdict, without further evidence and a further understanding of the situation.

But we are not confronted with that case. It is beyond our jurisdiction. The only issue involved here is the question as to whether or not we will give the President of the United States the power to make a temporary settlement with these railroads for their taking; to agree with them on a rental value for the period of this war and a few months thereafter.

As I said yesterday, if this were a permanent taking, a permanent agreement, I would not be willing to refer the matter to the executive branch of the Government. Under constitutional limitations it belongs to the judicial branch of the Government; and if it were a permanent taking I would insist that the finding of this verdict should go where the Constitution naturally places it, in the hands of the courts. But I recognize that as it is a temporary matter, to avoid financial complications, to avoid delays in operation, the more speedily we determine this question of compensation the better it is; and as a temporary matter it can not produce a serious and a permanent charge on the people of the United States. Therefore I am willing to grant to the President the right to make this agreement.

If you are willing to do so, then why unduly limit the power of the President to make the agreement? That is all there is in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. It is a limitation on presidential power in making this agreement. It does not fix the compensation; it does not determine it. It merely says, "You shall not go above a certain amount."

If the limitation that the Senator from Iowa desires to place in this bill requires the President to withhold his hand in making this agreement below a standard that is just compensation, we will throw these 86 railroad systems into the courts, because it is not natural to expect that the trustees of a great property are going to consent to accept a compensation that is unjust to the cestui que trust. They owe a duty to their stockholders. They must live up to that duty. If you put a limitation here that prevents the President from offering them just compensation, you drive these 86 roads into the courts, you delay this procedure, and possibly you may affect the finances of the whole Nation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I understand that under the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa the stockholders to whom the Senator from Alabama refers would receive just as much in dividends under Government control as they had received in the past.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They would in dividends, but they would not in returns. It has been repeatedly stated in this country, and it was repeatedly stated before the committee, that a well-organized, solvent, safely managed railroad should put one dollar in the property where it spent one dollar in dividends; that wherever it has a dollar to declare in dividends it ought to spend one dollar in the improvement of its system; and that has been done by a great many of the very systems to which this amendment applies.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether, under this bill, the Government is not obliged to continue the work of improvement in the place of the company?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; not of improvement.

Mr. THOMAS. So that it can deliver the roads back to the companies in as good condition as it received them?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. The bill refers to maintenance, to repairs, to upkeep, but not to improvement. For instance, the Pennsylvania Railroad in the last 10 or 15 years out of its earnings has spent a vast deal of its money in wiping out grade crossings, putting in double-track systems, heavier rails, and improving the whole system of the road. That came out of its earnings and was expended in the interest of the traffic of the people of the United States. Now, that money, if taken away from them, would not go for that purpose, nor would the Government guarantee that money would be spent for that purpose. The Government under this bill merely guarantees that the system as it exists to-day shall be kept in good repair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to state what I said before the committee—namely, that while I believe the compensation provided in the bill is greater than it ought to be, and there can not be any substantial argument, at least convincing to me, presented to demonstrate that the compensation provided is just to the people, I was, however, for the reasons given by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], willing that this arrangement or agreement should be made for the war emergency; but I did object most seriously to carrying this compensation over into a time of peace after the war had ended.

The railroad representatives before the committee in the first instance were very much in favor of ending the period of control; but some peculiar change came over them during the latter part of the hearings and they were then perfectly willing that this period of control should extend beyond the war indefinitely if necessary. The House committee has fixed 2 years and the Senate committee has fixed 18 months after the end of the war, after the emergency period has ceased; and this excessive compensation is to be paid during a time of peace.

I would like to have a vote on the last proposition first. If the Senate would confine the period during which this compensation is to be paid to the war I would not complain at this arrangement. I would be willing that the President should make an arrangement for the maximum amount. But not having made it, the two Houses having reported on retention periods of 18 months and 2 years, respectively, after the war, I can not support a compensation for a time of peace which I thoroughly believe to be too great.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who is absent on account of sickness. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S name was called). I wish to state that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent because of serious illness in his family.

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when Mr. WALSH'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is absent on account of ill health. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. WEEKS'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is absent, owing to the death of a relative. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY (after having voted in the negative). Has the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. GERRY. I understand that the junior Senator from New York, if present, would vote as I have voted on this matter. Therefore I ask that my vote in the negative may stand.

Mr. RANSDELL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. McLEAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire whether the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania. If he were present, I would vote "yea." As he is not present and not knowing how he would vote, I do not feel at liberty to vote at all.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 52, as follows:

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. PENROSE subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to state that I was called out of the Chamber for a few moments while the vote was taken on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. If I had been present, and had been at liberty to vote, I would have voted "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after the word "seventeen," in line 8, it is proposed to strike out the comma and insert a period.

It is also proposed to strike out all language in the bill on page 2, line 8, following the word "seventeen," down to and including the word "seventeen," in line 13, in the following words: "and in addition thereto an annual sum payable likewise in reasonable installments reckoned at a rate per cent to be fixed by the President upon the cost of any additions or betterments, less retirements, or road extensions, made during the six months ended December 31, 1917.".

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this amendment will eliminate from the compensation which the President will be authorized under the bill to agree upon with the carriers, sums invested in the property during the six-month period ended September 31, 1917. It will leave what is called in the bill the "standard return" unaffected.

Most of the discussion which has been had in the Senate concerning the subject of agreements touching compensation has related to what is called the standard return, namely, the average annual operating income for the three-year period ended June 30, 1917. That was the recommendation of the President in his proclamation and message to Congress, and if the amendment which I have proposed is agreed to, the President's recommendation will be substantially complied with.

This provision in the bill would add to the total amount of compensation which might be awarded carriers in class 1 something like six and a half million dollars. It is impossible to state definitely the amount, for two reasons: In the first place, we do not know whether all the roads in class 1 will be retained under Federal control; and, in the second place, we do not know what rate or percentage the President will fix on the sums invested in the property during the six-month period.

Senators will observe by reading the language which I have proposed to strike out, that the President is authorized to add to the compensation which he may agree upon with the carriers a reasonable percentage upon the sums invested in the property during this six-month period.

A second reason that I feel justifies me in offering the amendment is that, in my opinion, it is not necessary to enable the President to effectuate these agreements. I believe that the standard return is adequate for that purpose, and that it is not therefore necessary to authorize the President to allow these additional sums.

A third reason, which I suggest, is found in the fact that it may complicate the difficulties on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission in ascertaining the basis for compensation. It will require a somewhat extended investigation on the part of the commission to determine the amounts that have been invested in these various properties during the six-month period.

I do not know that there is anything further that I care to add, and I submit the amendment to the Senate for its consideration. I realize that it may be said that this, too, is embraced within the maximum authorization, and that the President is not compelled to award a percentage on sums invested by these carriers in their property during that period.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——.

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator kindly state whether his amendment tends to increase or to diminish the compensation to the railroads?

Mr. ROBINSON. I stated a moment ago that it will have the effect of decreasing by approximately $6,500,000 per annum the amount of compensation which may be awarded carriers in class 1 by virtue of agreements, and that the exact amount can not be stated, because we do not know what percentage the President may fix, and we do not know the exact amount that the commission will find has been invested in the property for carrier purposes during this period.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. PENROSE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). Repeating my previous announcement, I vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S name was called). I wish to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent because of serious illness in his family.

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. WEEKS'S name was called). I make the same announcement of the absence of my colleague [Mr. WEEKS] and his general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 44, nays 34, as follows:

So Mr. ROBINSON'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. On page 2, line 3, I move to strike out all after the word "income," down to and including the word "and," in line 6, and to insert in lieu thereof the following language: "of property operated by it on."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That does not change the meaning at all, but simply clarifies the language.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the amendment be read at the desk, so that I can clearly understand it.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is not printed, but I can read it again.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not quite hear what the Senator from Arkansas said, and I ask that it be read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 3, after the word "income," strike out the remainder, down to and including the word "and," in line 6, before the word "December," and insert the words "of property operated by it on," so as to read:

Railway operating income of property operated by it on December 31, 1917.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask that the amendment be stated once more. It may be very important.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 3, after the word "income," strike out the following words: "including therein such income of lines acquired by, leased to, or consolidated with such carrier between July 1, 1914, and," and insert "of property operated by it on," so as to read:

Equivalent as nearly as may be to its average annual railway operating income of property operated by it on December 31, 1917.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator keep the parentheses?

Mr. ROBINSON. Strike out the parentheses. That is correct. I thank the Senator from Michigan for calling my attention to it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask the Senator from Arkansas to make some further explanation of the necessity for that change. A change in the language might affect very seriously roads, at least, in my own State where one of the most important railroads is leased and the State receives from it a large revenue.

Mr. ROBINSON. The language that is used in the bill is to my mind ambiguous and certainly not as clear as it might be. This language was suggested to me by an expert and is intended to accomplish the same end that was in mind when the other language was written. It simply provides that in ascertaining the average annual railway operating income there shall be included property operated by the carrier on December 31, 1917.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator think that the word "lines" would be better than the word "property"? The word "property" is very broad and might include other than railway systems or railway lines.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the word "property" is better.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, this and the other amendment which was adopted was suggested by me as provisions which require amendment in order to clarify them. It does not seem to me that the amendment the Senator from Arkansas has offered makes much clearer if any the expression already used in the bill. There are several amendments which ought to be made to the bill prior to this one. For instance, we ought to determine the question of ownership. We ought to determine that question at the beginning, in order that we may know with what companies the President is authorized to make agreements.

The part in parentheses, a part of which the Senator from Arkansas proposes to strike out, which was certainly unintelligible before, evidently was intended to cover a system of roads, and the agreement was to be made with the system; but it was discovered also that a road operated by that system might not be the owner entitled to the compensation during the period of Government control. It is possible to conceive that a trunk line might own the majority of stock in line A, and line A under the definition heretofore given in the bill makes report to the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is the road which is entitled to make the agreement with the President in reference to taking over the road.

May I submit to the Senator from Arkansas and to the Senate whether this proposition does not make absolutely clear what we intend to say in the bill? I propose to strike out the parentheses and all the words down to the period in line 21 and insert:

If any lines were acquired by, leased to, or consolidated with such railroad or system between July 1, 1914, and December 31, 1917, both inclusive, and separate operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission were not made for such lines after such acquisition, lease, or consolidation, there shall be computed—

Which we have stricken out, however; it has to be changed in that respect—shall be computed, to be added to the total railway operating income of such railroad or system for the three years ending June 30, 1917, the total railway operating income of the lines so acquired, leased, or consolidated, for the period beginning July 1, 1914, and ending on the date of such acquisition, lease, or consolidation, or on June 30, 1917, whichever is the earlier.

That fixes the proposition that we are dealing with, the owner of the road, and that amendment I propose to offer if the committee does not. I define it as the company or system which is entitled to the possession of the road during the time of Federal control.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator whether the language in parentheses would mean that the lease or consolidation must have taken place during this time or merely that it existed during the period?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That which is in parentheses refers to the long time, the full period from July 1, 1914, to December 31, 1917.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But I mean, must the lease be made during that period or must it simply have existed during that period?

Mr. TOWNSEND. On the very first page the bill provides for compensation during this period, and there is no definition and no distinction as between that and the road taken for only a part of the time. If I could have been permitted to have presented some of the amendments which I think are absolutely vital in order to the understanding of this proposition there would have been no misunderstanding between us.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is a provision in the bill to the effect that no compensation shall be paid to any road for any period that it is not within Federal control. So if the President releases any railroad, compensation can not be paid it after that time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is not, of course, the exact point I have offered.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand it is not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will be very glad to meet that when we reach it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The point about which I ask the Senator is this: Suppose a lease was made prior to the time and existed during the period of taking given in the parentheses. Does the language in parentheses require that the lease shall be made within those dates or merely require that it existed within those dates?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the information I wish.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I assume it means for the period, but it does not say so. The provision in parentheses, I submit, is subject to great speculation as to just what it does mean. We have stricken out a part of the matter in parentheses.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest that we pass this amendment over for the present. It may be a very vital question in several States where the States own roads and the roads have been leased to other roads. I ask the Senator to let it be passed over.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to passing it over. I will withdraw it. The sole purpose I have is to clarify and improve language in the bill that I think is ambiguous. I ask that the amendment be passed for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that by unanimous consent the amendment will be temporarily passed over. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand the amendment was carried, and was so announced by the Chair, and then the Senator from Georgia asked for further information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state for the information of the Senator from Colorado that the Chair stated that the ayes seemed to have it, when a yea-and-nay vote was called for, as the Chair understood it.

Mr. THOMAS. No yea-and-nay vote was called for on this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that the yeas and nays were demanded.

Mr. THOMAS. Not demanded.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present the following amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Before the Senator presents that amendment I wish to make just one statement in reference to this amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If it is understood that I am not yielding my time——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It will be understood.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Otherwise I could not yield, because by the time the Senator made his statement my time might be exhausted.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It will take but a minute, and I think it will not be deducted from the Senator's time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan has the floor. The Chair must, under those circumstances, rule that if he yields, he yields his time. There is no other way in which orderly proceeding under the unanimous-consent agreement can take place.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment, if that is satisfactory to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is very satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and unanimous consent is given to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I offer the following amendment. It is in reality a series of three amendments, but as they are all closely connected I offer them as one, and during the 10 minutes time I can discuss the three I am sure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 6, strike out the words "called herein carriers" and the parentheses.

On page 1, line 7, strike out the words "any such carrier" and insert "the owner of any such railroad or system."

On page 5, line 14, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

Whenever used in this act the word "owner" includes any person, corporation, partnership, or association who during any portion of the period of Federal control of a railroad or system of transportation would be entitled to the possession, use, and control of such railroad or system in the absence of Federal control thereof. Wherever in this act reference is made to the period of Federal control in connection with an owner it shall be taken to refer to the portion of such period during which such owner but for such Federal control would have been entitled to the possession, use, and control of the railroad or system of transportation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senate, because, as I said yesterday, I am presenting no captious amendment? I am trying to keep the exact intention of the committee without incorporating any of my own ideas as to what the bill ought to be, but trying to make clear what we actually attempted to do.

In the first place, as to the first amendment, in line 6, I move to strike out the words "called herein carriers" and the parentheses that go with it. The carrier is referred to above, as you will notice, as "certain railroads and systems of transportation." All through the bill, with the exception of three cases, we do not mean railroads or system of transportation when we refer to the word "carrier," but we mean the corporation, the personality, if I may use the term, which can make a contract or an agreement.

A railroad can not make an agreement. A system of transportation can not make an agreement. It must be the owner of the railroad or the system.

Then, at the end of this paragraph I define what an owner is. An owner of a railroad is the one who was entitled to the use, occupation, and possession of the road during this period or any portion of this period, and only for such portion should it be entitled to the compensation.

Farther down, in line 7, on the next line, I move to strike out the words "any such carrier" and insert "the owner of such railroad or system."

With those provisions in the bill we have made clear that we are dealing with the railroads that are entitled and have a right to make an agreement or contract. No one else can make an agreement. It can only be made with a company that is entitled to the possession of the road. For instance, as I said before, if we make an agreement with a system for the period of Federal control, which we have defined here to be the period of control by the Government, and if that system is at the time the agreement is made entitled to the operating income from a branch line, that ought not to continue throughout the whole period unless it owns that railroad during the whole period. The object of these two amendments is to correct those inequalities and to make clear just exactly with what companies the President has the right to make the agreement.

So I have offered these amendments. I think every Senator will agree who has followed me that they will make clear the evident intention. I shall show as we go along a good many difficulties that we shall encounter by using improperly these two or three expressions.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I think the bill is perfectly clear as it is, so why define the carriers to be the railroads and systems of railroads which the President has taken over? Under that, of course, the President can not make an agreement with anybody who is not the owner of a railroad. He makes the agreement with the corporation which owns the railroad, and he would not be so foolish as to attempt to make an agreement with somebody who did not own the railroads. For instance, the Pennsylvania Railroad was taken over. The President may say to the Pennsylvania Railroad System, "I will make an agreement with you as an entire system, and I will not make an agreement with each separate railroad in the system of railroads which your company owns by stock ownership."

The word "railroad" was put into the bill; it is not in the proclamation, so that if there should be any possible question that some individual line was not a part of a transcontinental or, rather, I will say, an interstate-commerce system, it would cover it. In my own judgment "systems of railroad or transportation" would have been all that was necessary to have said in this bill. The President does not take over the physical property, of course. The physical property is in certain railroad corporations. When he takes over the corporation the title of the property is not changed, and he deals with, and we deal with, and we guarantee to, of course, the corporation which owns the property and which operates it.

It does not seem to me that this amendment makes it any clearer. I have not had time to examine it with care; but I do wish to say that it is not true that the committee spent all of its time listening to testimony and did not give any attention to the language of the bill. I do not believe that the bill is perfect; but I believe it fairly represents the idea of the committee, that the President was authorized to deal with these roads individually or were a system of roads controlled by one company to deal with the system. It does not seem to me necessary to state in this bill that the President must deal with the corporation which owns the road.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, neither the bill nor the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is entirely clear to me upon this point. It must be remembered that the term "carrier," which the Senator from Michigan seeks to strike out, or at least to change, so far as the definition is concerned, applies to section 3 as well as to section 1——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I stated that.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the right to enter the Court of Claims or the condemnation tribunal for an assessment of damages. Suppose the Pennsylvania Railroad—that seems to be the nearest, and, therefore, a very common illustration—owns the capital stock, as it does, of a great many subsidiaries. The subsidiary has a right under the terms of section 3 to enter the Court of Claims for an assessment of its damages, no matter what the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. may do. It can not agree with the President simply as a stockholder in the road for compensation to the subsidiary.

I pointed out the other day the indefinite expansions which could be made through the manipulation of this terminology. The Pennsylvania Railroad Co., of course, makes an agreement with the Government based upon its returns. We will say as to the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co.—I am speaking without absolute knowledge, but I think it is true—that the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. owns all of the stock of the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington road. That road can come before the tribunal appointed for the purpose, or finally before the Court of Claims, and have its compensation assessed in that way, although the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. has made a contract under the bill—I think it would be true under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan—which covers its earnings; that is, the earnings which it has derived from the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington road. I think that point ought to be made perfectly clear, and I want to ask the Senator from Michigan whether or not his amendment, in his opinion, covers that phase?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me take the Senator's time——

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I have finished.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Having exhausted my own time, I have not any right to speak.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I will stay on my feet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the bill provides that this contract can only be made with the road now making operating returns. If the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington road makes operating returns——

Mr. CUMMINS. It does.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, of course, it would be the company with which the President would be authorized to make an agreement; otherwise it would not be.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Pennsylvania Railroad gets all of the earnings of the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad, and it makes its agreement with the Government based on those earnings. Then in comes the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Co. and insists upon compensation for the use of its property.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But my amendment makes it absolutely certain that those operating returns could not be credited to two different concerns—the Pennsylvania system and the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington road.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not thoroughly examined the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, but I will accept his statement in that respect. I only know that the bill is fatally weak in that regard.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is what I am trying to correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in regard to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). I wish again to state that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness in his family.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am paired with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN. Repeating the announcement of the transfer of my pair that I made on the last vote, I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—28.

So Mr. TOWNSEND's amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and upon it I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 13 and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 13. That the Federal control of railroads and transportation system herein and heretofore provided for shall continue for and during the period of the war and until Congress shall thereafter order otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota, on which he asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there are quite a number of Senators who are in favor of the unification of the railroads of the country and continued Government control. There are others who are opposed to the continuation of Government control. The pending bill ends Government control at a certain date; so that it seems to me consistent and logical for Senators who are opposed to Government control after the war, or after a limited period, to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota. On the other hand, it seems to me equally true that Senators who are in favor of the unification of the railroad systems of the country and their operation as a nationalized unit under Government regulation and Government control, not simply temporarily as a war measure but permanently as a policy of transportation in the United States, must necessarily support the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota in order to be consistent.

I make this statement for the purpose of declaring my understanding that the issue is clearly made by this amendment. I expect to support it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I take issue with the statement of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. At the present time I feel that I would be in favor of the unification of the railroads under Government control. I do not believe, however, that this bill contemplates any such program. If such a bill were presented, I take it, it would have to be far more complete than this bill is; certainly the powers granted to the President would not be so generous as are provided in this bill if it were intended to inaugurate Government control of railroads during peace times.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator does not deny that the bill as presented by the committee terminates Government control at a certain date—18 months after the proclamation of peace?

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly, it terminates Government control, and so it was intended. This bill is not intended as a permanent Government-control bill; it has not been prepared with that in view. The only excuse on earth for some of the extraordinary powers granted by this bill is that it is a war measure. I think I will be prepared upon the termination of the life of this bill to vote for a bill for the unification and control of all the railroads under the Government; but certainly I would desire the bill prepared carefully by a committee with that object in view, and I should like to have an opportunity to consider that particular question. That opportunity can not be afforded now. I think the Senator from Washington, if he is in favor of this bill, is making an argument that is detrimental to its passage.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can not agree with the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. I am, and have been for years, as those who have heard me speak in the Senate know, in favor of the Government ownership of the capital of the public property known as the railways. Whatever instrumentalities we may select or create for the operation of that property, I am profoundly convinced that the Government ought to own all of the railway property in the country, but I can not vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota for two reasons: In the first place, the agreements that we are authorizing the President to make impose an unjust exaction upon the people of this country amounting to at least $180,000,000 a year, and I am unwilling to allow the indefinite possession of the railway companies to continue under agreements of that character. Second, I am opposed to it because I am unwilling that the railway properties of the United States shall be dominated by any one man for a single moment after the war ends. I have an amendment, which I proposed in the committee, and which I shall offer here at the proper time, which at the end of the war passes the power which we are now giving the President into a board of railway directors to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

For these reasons, which I shall not elaborate, I shall feel constrained to vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there are already a number of provisions in this bill which I do not approve. It is all that I can do to vote for it in its present shape, but with the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota added I could not vote for it.

I do not believe that we should legislate so as to place upon the President responsibilities which he can not perform and end our legislation by designating him as the party who is to perform the responsibilities. When the scope of the work is so wide that we know the President can not perform it, I consider that a proper discharge of our duty as legislators requires that we go further and designate the plan of organization by which the duties shall be performed; and in the case of handling the railroads, instead of saying that the President shall take them and the President shall operate them, it would be better legislation to designate a commission and prescribe the duties of its members and really to limit their powers. In this manner alone can we perform the responsibilities that really pertain to the legislative branch of the Government.

But, Mr. President, already the railroads have been taken over. Already a management has been begun, and I believe the Secretary of the Treasury has made an organization as wise as could be hoped for looking to the handling of the roads. As this organization is already made and is operating as well as I could hope it would operate, I am willing, under the circumstances, to vote for that part of the bill, in no way committing myself to the policy of such legislation. I have entire confidence in the great executive ability of the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not know anyone to whom with more confidence I could see the task intrusted. Yet I have no hope that under Government management the roads can be handled substantially better than they have been handled before or that the public will get any better service. The justification for this action, in my opinion, is the financial one, the possibility that Government management may save the country from financial complications that would hinder raising the money necessary for the conduct of the war. The only excuse is the war and the finances of the country incident to the war.

I would prefer that under the terms of this bill Government control should end with the war. I certainly would prefer to limit it to 6 months after the war. I stretch my capacity to yield in this respect when I follow the committee provision allowing 18 months. If the Government control is to be permanent, then I must vote against the measure altogether, for I would not be willing to invest permanently in one officer the control of an income of three and a half billions of dollars a year, and together with the privilege of controlling the business of every citizen in the United States, together with the destiny of every locality. Again, the compensation we are allowing to the railroads amounts to war profits growing out of the volume of business which the war has brought to them. I would not be willing to place permanently upon the people of the United States in time of peace, when the volume of freights will be less, when the amount of the revenues will be less, a charge based upon these three years of heavy war business.

These two reason, it seems to me, are amply sufficient to induce everyone to vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota. I hope, if any change is made, that the time will be reduced from 18 to 6 months and lessen by that length of time the one-man rule of the railroads of our country and diminish to that extent the high rates provided by this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had thought of presenting some views in opposition to the Government control of public utilities, including railroads; but as the longer I remain in this body the less inclination I have to consume time in debating questions that are pretty well understood, I came to the conclusion that I would not weary the Senate by making the observations I had in mind. But so far as concerns the superior accommodations that the public are getting under the present railroad management as compared with what we had before the railroads were taken over by the Government, I want to say a single word.

Any man who goes from here to New York, and especially from here to Boston, under existing conditions is very forcibly reminded of the fact that all the evils that have been complained of in railroad management have not by any manner of means been removed. It is true that the President and the Director General of Railroads have repealed numerous laws that the Congress during the last 20 years has been placing on the statute books that embarrassed and harassed the railroads of the country, and we had hoped that by doing that we might get superior accommodations, but the contrary has resulted.

When I go to my home I go to Boston, and from Boston I go 75 miles north, to Concord, N. H. Under railroad management we had three trains a day that carried us from Boston to Concord in 1 hour and 55 minutes. At the present time it is impossible to make those 75 miles under three hours, and sometimes it takes a longer time. The same condition exists to a large extent in all sections of the country; but we are hoping—I am hoping—that the present management may be able to work out these problems and that it may provide at least as good accommodations as we had when the wicked railroad men managed the property that they controlled.

I do not believe Government ownership is going to help this country in any way, and I believe it is fraught with the direst danger to the best interests of our people.

In that connection, I am going to ask unanimous consent—and that is all I shall say on this subject to-day—to have read from the desk an article from the London Daily Mail, which I had published four years ago, showing the management of the telephone system in Great Britain. Every Senator who has traveled on the Continent of Europe or in other countries of the world where Government ownership exists knows that they do not get as good accommodations as we have in the United States. Why, Mr. President, it is almost impossible to get a telephone message 5 miles from Paris or London in an hour; and we know that the railroads in any of those countries where Government ownership exists are not run as well as they have been in the United States. But, Mr. President, I do not care to weary the Senate, and I will simply ask that the brief article which I have sent to the desk may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read the article referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the London Daily Mail, Friday, Jan. 2, 1914.]

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF TELEPHONE LINES IN GREAT BRITAIN.

WHY AND BECAUSE.

Why is it that Government ownership and management of the telephone is practically always a failure? Why is it that for every thousand Europeans there is only one telephone, while for every thousand Americans there are 15? Why is it that the country which has done most to improve the telephone, both technically and commercially, and to popularize its use is the country in which its operation and development have been and still are exclusively the work of private enterprise? Why is it that not one of the innumerable discoveries that have transformed the telephone industry in the last 30 years has emanated from a department of state; that European governments have been the last to adopt them and that the verdict which experts are obliged to pass upon them, with perhaps two partial exceptions, is that they have not learned their business? Why is it that there are great and famous towns in Europe at this moment where methods and machinery that were abandoned 20 years ago in America are still in use?

Why is it that throughout the length and breadth of Great Britain and the Continent hardly a single efficient long-distance service is to be found? Why is it that in New York one can invariably get the number one wants, and get it at once, while in London one has often to wage a prolonged and embittering battle with a slow operator, insufficient lines, and a conversation—if any conversation ensues—that is only audible when it is interrupted?

The broad answer to all these questions is that the alertness and enterprise that are essential to telephone development can not be expected from a government department. The characteristics of the bureaucratic mind and temperament forbid it. The organization of a government office, with a virtually irremovable staff, forbids it. The spirit of officialdom, with its traditions of subordination, its narrow professional outlook, its unwillingness to concentrate responsibility, its insensible stifling of initiative, forbids it. A government department can not raise and discipline its staff to the same level of efficiency as a commercial company. It can not act with the same freedom and directness as a private board. It can not pursue a business object without deference to a hundred influences and considerations that have nothing to do with business. It can not advertise with anything like the same boldness. It naturally seeks efficiency through economy instead of economy through efficiency. It has to think of politics and political reactions. Its whole constitution prevents it from proving as enterprising as private initiative, as prompt to discard obsolete methods and apparatus, as quick to adopt new inventions, as skillful and aggressive in gathering in subscribers.

As we all know, to our cost, we have Government ownership and operation of the telephones in Great Britain. We shall never have a telephone system worthy of the name so long as the post office remains in undivided and despotic control. Sooner or later that authority must be modified or delegated if our telephone system is ever to attain an even passable standard of efficiency.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the item just read by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] showing the experience of Great Britain in the ownership of the telephone system has probably warned them against any undue haste in taking over other utilities.

The British system of handling the railroad problem is no criterion for us. Their whole system of government is different. The executive and legislative functions are so inextricably interwoven that action by Parliament is imperative before any action can be taken. With us the Executive moves, frequently of his own initiative, but within his especial sphere, and Congress supplements his action by appropriate legislation.

The first provision for taking over the British railroads dates back to July 30, 1842, which provided for troop transportation and better regulation of railroads. The movement of soldiers with baggage, arms, and ammunition was made mandatory and necessary contracts were made to that end. In 1844 this power was enlarged. In 1871 Parliament empowered an officer of the Government to take possession of railroads and railroad plants on occasional emergency. Their problem was very different from ours, and is to-day. But 15,000 miles are embraced in the arrangement entered into—in August, 1914—at the breaking out of the present war. This was done by an amicable arrangement between the Government and the committee of general managers.

Last year the arrangement was extended to include the roads in Ireland, covering something over 3,000 miles, but, altogether, included only 12 or 14 companies, a comparatively easy task when we consider that our railroads embrace 50 large systems and nearly 700 separate corporations.

One of the first and most vexatious problems which the British committee had to meet was the question of increase in wage for over one-half million employees. This situation was finally met by an increase in compensation over that of 1914 of more than $165,000,000, a sum equal to all the dividends paid on all English railroad stocks the year before the war.

The act of Parliament does not permit the indefinite continuance of control and must be renewed weekly, notwithstanding their proximity to the very theater of the war. The whole arrangement emphasizes deliberation and solicitude and in no manner commits that Government to the doubtful expedient of unrestricted Government ownership.

Our problem is less acute and relates to the war only collaterally. There is some congestion, much confusion, a great deal of uncertainty because of the financial embarrassment and the desirability of stabilizing railroad credit and protecting the roadbed and equipment from unnecessary deterioration and decay, which would be alike disastrous and discreditable to us.

To avoid such a possible calamity and to keep the highways of commerce open to the communities they serve and thus safeguard the free interchange of commodities and encourage production, this step has been taken by the President of the United States.

I am not here to criticize or find fault with the President. There must be some sound reason for this radical departure from our previous treatment of the railroad problem. He undoubtedly thinks the war situation can be best met in this way. Dangerous as the expedient may be, he has already taken over the railroads and is now exercising authority thereover, and I do not believe that he has chosen this means of committing the country to a permanent policy of Government ownership. I prefer to believe that he is seeking to unify these roads for the more expeditious handling of war materials and food products, and by the same token guarantees that this property will be preserved and protected during the strain and disaster of war.

This plan can not be given effect unless Congress provides the necessary compensation guaranteed by the Constitution. We may haggle and squirm and hesitate; we may even impute bad motives to those who are responsible for committing the Government to this experiment; yet how idle and impotent we would be in the face of the fact that we are committed and are now in possession of these roads. Not to make the necessary appropriation to enable the President to deal justly and fairly with these properties would be to expose ourselves to the charge that we were seeking to capitalize this error to the disadvantage of the Executive, a thing I would decline to do. I am ready to meet the situation fairly and generously, leaving to him the plan to be pursued. The country is in war; we are face to face with danger. We must act together, with an eye single to the welfare of the country. Neither personal or political considerations have any right to move us. There can be no sacrifice too great for us to bear, and if our course seems now and then to drift out of the beaten path so long pursued we have the consolation of knowing that in the estimation of those in command of the ship of state that course seems to be best for the country in the present crisis.

If the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota is to be adopted, I give notice that when these amendments come up in the Senate I am going to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] without any hesitation whatever.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the words proposed to be inserted by the Senator from South Dakota the following:

Provided, That upon the termination of the war the President shall appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate, a board of railway directors, to be composed of five persons, one of whom shall be an engineer, one a financier, one trained in the operation of railway property, one whose interests have allied him with the shipping public, and one a lawyer. The members of the board shall hold office during the remainder of the period of Federal control. Removals must be for cause shown, and vacancies shall be filled in the same manner as original appointments are made. Each of said directors shall receive compensation at the rate of $12,500 per year. The principal office shall be in the District of Columbia. All necessary employees of the board shall be appointed by the board under the rules of the Civil Service Commission.

Immediately upon the organization of said board of directors all the powers, whether granted by the act of August 29, 1916, or herein granted to the President, shall vest in said board of railway directors: Provided further, That all agreements for just compensation shall not continue longer than the termination of the war, and the termination of the war, for the purpose of these two provisos, shall be construed as the time at which armed hostilities cease.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this amendment, if adopted, passes from the hands of the President upon the termination of armed hostility the power that is given to him in the act of 1916, and the further powers that we grant in this act to a board of railway directors, who shall exercise that power during the period of Federal control, whatever that period may be.

It, second, limits the authority of the President in making agreements for compensation to the termination of the war, instead of permitting, as the bill does, those agreements to be made for the period of the war and for 18 months after the treaties of peace are signed and ratified.

I gave a few moments ago the reasons that would prevent me from voting for the amendment as it is offered. If these qualifications are added to the amendment, I shall be very glad to vote for it, because I am not in favor of limiting the period of control that is named in the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota providing for an indefinite period of Federal control after the expiration of the war relates to one of the matters concerning which the committee found great difficulty. I think I divulge no secrets of the committee when I say that it was finally arranged that a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and myself should attempt to work out a provision touching this and one other feature of the bill for the consideration of the committee, and that we succeeded in agreeing upon a compromise which was finally adopted by the committee.

I want to state, Mr. President, for the benefit of Senators who are familiar with the discussions that have heretofore taken place in the Senate concerning this subject that it was not the thought of the proponents of the bill or of myself that the period of Federal control should be left indefinite in order to promote either the control that is provided in this bill or what has come to be called the Government ownership of carriers. As to that last subject, it is one which can not be precluded by legislation at this time. It is one which, in my opinion, will not be very materially affected by the provisions of the bill. I have never felt that it was an intelligent procedure to attempt on this legisation to determine a question of that far-reaching consequence. I have felt all the while that if we undertake in this so-called emergency measure to determine the future status of the railroads after the expiration of the war the consideration of the bill would be very greatly prolonged.

There were some reasons which made me hesitate to agree upon a fixed limitation as to Federal control, and I can state them very briefly. In the first place, at the expiration of the war there will be many unsettled questions between the railroads and the Government which will probably require legislation. The subject is not so simple as to be dealt with conclusively in agreements to be entered into now. I have felt that it might be wise not to compel the return of the carriers to their owners until Congress has had an opportunity of deliberately working out those propositions.

In the second place, when once you have extended Government credit to the railroads, it will be difficult to withdraw it without materially impairing and endangering the value of railroad credit, and in all probability if the question as to what shall be the future status of the railroads remains unsettled at the expiration of the limitation the railroads themselves or their representatives will want it extended.

But, Mr. President, I do not believe that it is wise to attempt in this legislation to determine the very important question as to how the railroads shall be operated after the war. Almost every Senator who has studied the subject admits that it will be necessary to modify the old system; that some legislation will be required; that it will be necessary to repeal some laws; and for that reason all Senators, so far as I know, have agreed that the period of Federal control should extend beyond the termination of the war.

The same controversy that arose in the committee has arisen here. All about me I hear Senators saying that they would prefer to have the period of control shortened. Some of them have said on the floor that they would like to have Federal control terminated immediately upon the ending of the war; others have said that six months would be an adequate period. My conviction, therefore, is that the best thing that can be done is to adhere to the compromise which was effected in the committee and to sustain the provisions of the bill with regard to the limitation of one and a half years after the expiration of the war. I think it would be a very grave mistake to shorten that period and I do not believe that the temper of the Senate would permit its extension.

Now, Mr. President, as to the amendment which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has offered to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], the effect of that amendment is to provide two systems of Federal control, one to be operative during the war and the other to take effect at the termination of the war. It is of course trite to say that no Senator can tell when this war will end. We hope it will end very quickly; we fear it may be some time in the distant future; but I submit to the Senate that it is unwise to attempt now to legislate for conditions in the period after the termination of the war; that it is unwise to attempt to provide for two systems of Federal control. If Congress desires to do so when the war has ended it can turn the operation of the railroads over to a board of directors as contemplated by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. It is also true that we could repeal that provision of the bill, should we adopt it now, but the point I am making is that we would accomplish nothing of a substantial nature to adopt a dual system of Federal control, one to take effect now and the other to take effect at the end of the war.

Therefore, I repeat, the best thing in my judgment to be done is to retain the limitation in the bill which the committee agreed upon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, while I believe that Government ownership, or at any rate Government unification and control, of railroads is just as sure to come as the night is to follow the day, and that in no distant future, I do not consider that the question of Government ownership is involved in the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota. I favor that amendment because there are so many things in the bill that I consider unwise and unjust and iniquitous that I want Congress to be free to get rid of them just as soon as possible. They are going to be adopted. I think we have a right to assume that the bill substantially as reported by the committee is going to be passed with all the things in it that make the Senator from Georgia hesitate to vote for it, with all the things in it that will possibly lead the Senator from Iowa to vote against it, and yet we are going to tie the hands of Congress for 18 months after the close of the war and prevent it from remedying those things.

I am in favor of leaving the hands of Congress free to act just as soon as possible, and I believe that the legislation will appear so unjust after it is enacted as to lead Congress to provide for a permanent system just as soon as possible, either before the war ends or afterwards.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia and Mr. ROBINSON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Georgia. He rose first.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, why does not the Senator present this amendment: Let the limitation of 18 months remain, with a proviso—provided, however, that Congress may shorten the time—and I will vote for it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the provision as it now exists and as it is reported by the committee. If the Senator will permit me, the provision which the committee reported does not tie the hands of Congress. Congress can act at any time. The limitation is that it shall not continue longer than 18 months after the expiration of the war, which, of course, implies that it may not continue that long. There is also a provision in the bill that the President may relinquish all rights at any time he chooses.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me ask the Senator, does the bill provide that agreements made by the President, if made to extend 18 months beyond the close of the war, can be modified at any time prior to that date?

Mr. ROBINSON. The President is given very broad power with respect to the agreements. There is nothing in the bill that requires him to agree with the railroads for any fixed period, and the probability is that the agreements will run for a definite period, from year to year or from month to month.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Under the bill the President can contract with these roads for 18 months beyond the close of the war, and Congress can not change that contract when it has been entered into.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Since Congress has power to terminate Federal control, the President could not, if he desired to do so, which, of course, he would not, estop Congress from exercising its function. There is a provision in the bill that no compensation shall be paid for any period extending beyond the actual Federal control. I think that is carefully safeguarded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Iowa a moment ago said what I believe to be the effect of the bill—that the President can make a contract to extend for 18 months beyond the close of the war.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I go further. I do not agree with the Senator from Arkansas. I think the President must do it. I think the only authority that is given him here is authority to agree upon the just compensation during the period of Federal control, and that standard is 18 months after the expiration of the war.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will permit me, the period of Federal control——

Mr. JONES of Washington. My time is going to be gone.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely say that the period of Federal control is not fixed in the bill, and therefore the President is not compelled to agree upon any definite time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The divergent views in reference to that matter simply strengthen me in the opinion that we ought to leave this matter to Congress; and that is all there is in it. Any future Congress can extend the 18-month period to a 5-year period if it sees fit, and unless the agreement does have the effect that I think it has, Congress can limit the period to 6 months and limit each contract to 6 months. Why not leave the matter in the discretion of Congress? That is exactly what the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota provides. Let us leave ourselves free. I have confidence in what future Congresses will do. I believe that a future Congress can be depended upon to provide a permanent system. This is not a permanent system. The amendment of the Senator from South Dakota does not provide a permanent system. It is just as temporary as it is with the 18-month limitation, except we have all the iniquities possible absolutely continued for a period of 18 months beyond the termination of the war.

So, Mr. President, regardless of whatever views I may have with reference to Government ownership, I can very heartily support the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota if he will do this. I think the word "thereafter" in his amendment ought to be cut out, because it seems to me that that is an attempt to limit the power of Congress to act and prevent its action until the war closes. I believe when we get through with some of these very urgent matters Congress can very well and probably will settle down and try to devise some permanent system for the control of these railroads, the necessity for which everybody conceives. I do not want to adopt a provision which says that this shall continue until the close of the war unless Congress shall thereafter, after the close of the war, otherwise provide. I want it to be free, and from the time hostilities cease until a treaty of peace is actually signed and ratified we shall probably have ample time to prepare permanent legislation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa impresses me favorably, but I do not know whether I should be in favor of it or not. I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina, if I have any time remaining.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I want to call the Senator's attention to section 13, which takes cognizance of the very matter that is now under discussion. That section reads:

SEC. 13. That the Federal control of railroads and transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall not continue longer than 18 months after the proclamation of peace terminating the war in which the United States is now engaged: Provided, however, That the President may, prior to July 1, 1918, relinquish control of all or any part of any railroad or system of transportation further Federal control of which the President shall deem not needful or desirable; and the President may at any time during the period of Federal control agree with the owners to relinquish all or any part of any railroad or system of transportation—

The point that I am making is this—

Provided further, That the President may relinquish all railroads under Federal control at any time he shall deem such action needful or desirable. No right to compensation shall accrue to any owner from and after the date of relinquishment for property relinquished under authority of this section.

Therefore every contract that is made will be made, of course, in the light of that provision.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but if the contract is made in express terms to continue for 18 months after the termination of the war, as it can be made under this proposed law, then it will continue for 18 months.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But does not the Senator from Washington understand that in a contract under a law which gives the President such power as this does, he may, upon notice, relinquish any road at such time as he deems it will not any further conserve the public interest to hold it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the President should reserve that right in the agreement that he makes, of course that would be made a part of it, I suppose, and the contract could be terminated, but there is nothing here to prevent the President from making a contract running for 18 months beyond the war, without any condition limiting it or permitting him to withdraw it. If he should make such a contract, it would run beyond the period of the war.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, just one word in reference to the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. The proposition of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is that there shall be extended into peace times the conditions under which we are taking over the railroads; in other words, granting them certain compensation that no one can control—a radical departure from the present status of things—and projecting that arrangement indefinitely into peace times. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment that provides, in his opinion, machinery that he could risk indefinitely. The proposition of the Senator from Iowa, in other words, is that he is proposing to legislate now in this emergency according to his idea how the railroads ought to be run after peace comes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina will allow me to correct him there, I wish to say that I am simply proposing to substitute a board for the President during the peace time; that is all. It does not affect the length of Federal control at all.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But, Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa would be perfectly willing for that board thus appointed to go on indefinitely, for he says that if his amendment were adopted, then he would vote for indefinite tenure under that system, as modified by his amendment, which means that that is his idea of controlling the railroads during times of peace.

I submit that as fair-minded, honest men, the thing for us to do is to take this bill as a war measure, to treat it as a war measure, and to terminate that treatment when the war conditions are over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question as to further procedure. We all agreed to this unanimous-consent agreement, some of us with hesitation, making it apply to the legislative day of Thursday. I will ask the Senator if he expects to complete this bill during this calendar day?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. My idea was that we would go on until the 10-minute limitation of debate is over, then take a recess, and finish the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some of us would like to know about when we are likely to take that recess. Would the Senator think of running beyond 6 o'clock?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No. My purpose was that at 6 o'clock we should take a recess, so as to begin the next session of the legislative day under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will be satisfactory if the Senator will move to take a recess at 6 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like in this connection to state to the Senator that I desire to run on until 6 o'clock, when the 10-minute limitation will have expired.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. I wanted the floor, and I thought the Senator from South Carolina had concluded.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am through.

Mr. REED. If I am not interrupting, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, the chairman of the committee, to consider this proposition. Perhaps I shall not offer an amendment upon it to-night, but possibly the committee will see fit to bring in one if the suggestion commends itself to the committee. The language of section 1 is:

That the President, having in time of war taken over the possession, use, control, and operation (called herein Federal control) of certain railroads and systems of transportation (called herein carriers), is hereby authorized to agree with and to guarantee to any such carrier making operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission that during the period of such Federal control it shall receive as just compensation not exceeding an annual sum—

That is a clear right on the part of the President to make a contract covering the period of the war and the 18 months' period thereafter, unless there is to be found in the bill somewhere express language giving the right to terminate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask the Senator from Missouri to read section 13 of the bill—the last section.

Mr. REED. I have done so. When we come to the last section of the bill, to which the chairman of the committee refers me, we find this language:

SEC. 13. That the Federal control of railroads and transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall not continue longer than 18 months after the proclamation of peace terminating the war in which the United States is now engaged.

That, of course, fixes a limit of 18 months, and the President, so far as we have proceeded now, could contract for that period. Following the language on we find that the President may, prior to the 1st day of July, 1918, relinquish control of certain of the roads, and then we find the proviso, in line 12, which reads:

Provided, further, That the President may relinquish all railroads under Federal control at any time he shall deem such action needful or desirable.

But while you find the right to reserve to the President to relinquish these roads——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the provision beginning in line 9 of that section.

Mr. REED. The Senator calls my attention to the language—

And the President may at any time during the period of Federal control agree with the owners to relinquish all or any part of any railroad or system, of transportation—

But that does not change the proposition I am trying to state. Under the provisions of the bill, as I see it, the President can contract for the period of 18 months after the war, and I think may be held to be bound to contract for the period of the war and 18 months thereafter. The President then has the right to terminate the period of the contract by his own act. I think, notwithstanding anything he may put in the contract, he can terminate it; but we do not know who may be President at that time; of course, we can not tell; the exigencies that happen in this life, the duration of the war, and other matters are to be considered. Now, is it not wise to incorporate in the bill some language reserving to the Congress the right to limit Federal control—and by "Congress" I mean the Congress by law, which, of course, implies the presidential action in connection with it that of Congress—so that there will be written into the contracts at the time they are made the express reservation of law giving to the United States the right to terminate them by law. A few words will do it; and in view of the doubt, I suggest to the committee the propriety of an amendment of that kind.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, does the Senator really have serious doubt about the power of Congress to repeal this proposed law at any time?

Mr. REED. Absolutely, if a contract has been made. I am of the opinion that if the President were to make a contract for the period of the war and for 18 months thereafter, and did not see fit himself to terminate the contract, the contract could not be annulled by an act of Congress, unless we place in this act a reservation of the right to change it. I am not going to insist that I am necessarily right about it; but I think a doubt exists, and I think that the insertion in line 13, after the word "President," of the words "or the United States by act of Congress," will settle the entire question.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If I may make a suggestion to the Senator right there, I have not thought about the suggestion he makes to us for our consideration; but would not the Senator's proposal inject two parties to deal with the railroads in relation to the contracts to be made, one the Congress and the other the President, and might it not inject such an element of doubt and uncertainty as to make any agreement rather doubtful? I merely throw that out as a suggestion.

It seems to me that if the railroads are going to deal with the President, then they may learn just what he is going to do by communicating with him; but if we also reserve the right to Congress to change the contract, the railroads might not know exactly what kind of a contract they would be able to secure.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, a moment ago he was insisting that Congress does now have that right under the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; I said the President had.

Mr. REED. I understood a number of Senators to say that the right existed also on the part of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But the Senator from South Carolina did not say that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator probably has in mind the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. REED. I was probably in error when I said the Senator from South Carolina had taken that position; but other Senators have taken it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not exactly understand, if the Senator will allow me a moment, how Congress can authorize and direct the President, and give him the power to do a thing, and then say that he can not do it. The bill expressly provides that he shall, of his own initiative, terminate any of these contracts when he sees fit to do so and when the public good in his judgment so demands. Now, if on the other hand, pari passu, we invest Congress with power to do the same thing, the railroads would not know where they stood. So it seems to me that the only question of doubt would be the question raised by the Senator that we do not know who might be President; but I take it that all Presidents are pretty much alike in some respects.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question, if he will permit me. The Senator from Missouri understands, of course, that the constitutional limitation prohibiting the impairment of the obligation of contracts is upon the States, and not upon the Federal Government; in other words, the making of a contract can not estop Congress from legislating upon the subject.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have heard that proposition often laid down, and while it is true that there is no express constitutional provision that the United States can not impair the obligation of a contract, I think the authorities are perfectly clear that the United States can not take property without due process of law; and that when you impair the obligation of a contract you do take property without due process of law. The courts have so held. I think the fifth amendment covers it, but that is not the point I am talking about. It is perfectly clear that if we do write into this law words expressly reserving to Congress the power to turn back these roads, notwithstanding any contract, we will then be in a position to do it if the country wants to do it. Many Senators think that that right exists anyway; but, as there is a doubt about it, why not put in these three or four words? Then every railroad company will understand, Congress will understand, and the President will understand that the power is reserved to change these contracts. I make the suggestion as one desiring to aid the bill, and not in an antagonistic spirit, for the consideration of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I want to get back for just a moment to the amendment. Referring to the suggestion made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], I desire to modify the original amendment by striking out the word "thereafter" in line 4.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota as modified.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota as modified.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I think the yeas and nays were ordered on the amendment some time ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are now ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). May I inquire whether the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. THOMAS. I have a standing pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. WEEKS's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is absent, as I have already stated. He is paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. If present my colleague would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCLEAN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. If present he would vote against this amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Making the same transfer that I made on a previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. KIRBY. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], who, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. HALE. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FERNALD]. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and will allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 61, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota was rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present, out of order, a favorable report from the Finance Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be compelled to hold that under the rule of the Senate the unanimous-consent agreement precludes any other business until 6 o'clock, at least.

Mr. SIMMONS. I apprehended that the Chair might so hold, but I thought I might get in this report without having to wait until 6 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unfortunately, the Chair will have to say to the Senator from North Carolina that since the present occupant of the chair came here a rule has been adopted whereby a unanimous-consent agreement can not be set aside except upon one day's notice.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not unaware of that. I simply wanted to make this report, if possible.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 11, after the word "property," it is proposed to insert the word "while," so that, if amended, the clause will read:

But no process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property while under such Federal control.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, that amendment does not change the meaning of the proposition at all, and I have no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of section 13, the following words:

Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect the existing laws or powers of the States in relation to taxation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the State of New Jersey receives $7,000,000 from the railroads in the way of taxation, which is appropriated directly to the schools of the State. The object of this amendment is to make certain that there will be no interference by the Federal Government with that method of taxation.

I ask if the chairman of the committee will not accept the amendment?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I am perfectly agreeable to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 10, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 10. That carriers while under Federal control shall, in so far as is not inconsistent therewith, or with the provisions of this act, or any other act applicable to such Federal control, or with any order of the President, be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under statutes or at common law, including the laws enacted or liabilities imposed under State authority for the regulation of the common carriers of traffic wholly within the State; and suits may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law. But no process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property under such Federal control.

That the Interstate Commerce Commission, in addition to the powers conferred by the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and acts amendatory thereof, is authorized to investigate, hear, and determine on application of the President and in the manner provided in said act, whether the rate or rates charged by any carrier or carriers under Federal control are, under the conditions, unjust or unreasonable or prejudicial to the public interest or to the purpose for which said control has been authorized and assumed, and on such hearing and determination to prescribe and order what rate or rates, charge or charges are, under the conditions, just and reasonable and which shall be observed as the maximum to be charged during such control.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, there are two changes in section 10 provided for by the proposed amendment.

The first is in the first paragraph of section 10 of the bill; and I am not sure, Mr. President, but that the amendment as proposed to the first paragraph of section 10 will simply make more certain what was intended by the committee. The only change made in the first paragraph is by the insertion of the following words after the word "law" in line 8:

Including the laws enacted or liabilities imposed under State authority for the regulation of the common carriers of traffic wholly within the State.

So that, if amended, the paragraph would read:

That carriers while under Federal control shall, in so far as is not inconsistent therewith, or with the provisions of this act, or any other act applicable to such Federal control, or with any order of the President, be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under statutes or at common law, including the laws enacted or liabilities imposed under State authority for the regulation of the common carriers of traffic wholly within the State.

Under the theory, Mr. President, that the amendment will make it more certain than the bill, we would suppose, perhaps, that the word "statutes" referred to State as well as Federal statutes; but that is not clear. The words in the bill are "under statutes or at common law." If that language excludes State statutes and legislation and regulation under State statutes, it, of course, will have the effect of destroying railroad regulation under State systems, and I do not believe that is desirable. The exigencies of the case do not require it. After all, Mr. President, under the terms of the first paragraph of section 10 if any State regulation or statute is inconsistent with any order made by the President, the order of the President will, of course, supersede the State statute; but aside from the authority of the President—and aside from the regulation of rates or the initiation of rates he may make many, many orders—the State board of railroad commissioners surely should have control.

Mr. President, we can not ignore the great benefits conferred upon the people of a State by the action of the State boards of railroad commissioners. They have proved the greatest help in my own State of South Dakota; and, as I understand, they are coordinating and cooperating with the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

We have a fine example just now of the successful work of our own railroad commission. It was a case of rates charged by the railroads for hauling coal between the coal fields of Wyoming and points in South Dakota. Under the law a case was instituted by our railroad commission before the Interstate Commerce Commission, resulting in a recent decision to the effect that the railroad rates were, by order of the commission, reduced from what they were; and they had been, in fact, prohibitive of the bringing in of coal from the State of Wyoming.

Now, Mr. President, let me call attention to the second paragraph of section 10.

The second paragraph of section 10 gives the President the power to initiate rates. It in effect gives him the power to establish rates; for although the rates initiated by the President might be burdensome or unjust to the public, anyone would hesitate to complain to the commission.

What does my second amendment propose—the amendment to the second paragraph of section 10? It proposes that in addition to the powers conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission by the interstate-commerce act the commission shall, on the application of the President, investigate, hear, and determine any case where it may be alleged by him that the rates are unjust or unreasonable, or are prejudicial to the public interest, or are prejudicial to the purposes for which control of the railroads was assumed and has been authorized by act of Congress. I am satisfied, Mr. President, that all the benefits desired can be obtained in that way, by simply authorizing the President under the act to make application himself to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the fixing or the changing of a present rate on any line or the rate established by any carrier.

I have heard many objections, Mr. President, to the provision in the bill giving the President the power to initiate rates. All the good will be accomplished that is necessary to be accomplished, all that any exigency will require, by permitting the President under the law to make application himself to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the changing of any given rate, the rate of any line or of an entire system.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that under the conditions this is a most reasonable provision. I do not believe we want to put it in the power of the President of the United States to initiate, or, as I said, in effect to establish a rate for the whole country; but here the President can at any time—not in the ordinary case, but if the public welfare requires it or if it be for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this bill—appear before the railroad commission or file his application before the Interstate Commerce Commission and have an investigation and a hearing, just as the bill provides may be had upon an initiated rate of which complaint is made; and I believe that all the exigencies and necessities of the case will be covered and that the great public will be better satisfied with a provision of that kind.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the Senator. Do I understand that it is his view that under the powers granted by this bill the President has the right to initiate rates within a State, or only in interstate commerce?

Mr. STERLING. In interstate commerce, probably. However, on reflection I am inclined to think that the President would have a right under this bill to establish a rate for traffic wholly within a State.

Mr. PHELAN. The bill provides that the only appeal is to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. Therefore, by implication, I should say the initiation referred only to interstate rates.

Mr. STERLING. That is true; the appeal is to the Interstate Commerce Commission. But it is probably true that in this particular case, and to cover this class of cases, the Interstate Commerce Commission is made the instrument for the investigation of these rates.

Mr. PHELAN. I should like to ask the same question of the Senator from South Carolina, in charge of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the committee itself was in doubt as to the real interpretation of this language. It seemed as if it were giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power of review when the President had initiated rates and made no other provision, and the interpretation would be that in case under this emergency clause he changed a rate that originated within the State, then it practically nullified or set aside the State commission to that extent.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill to inform me and the Senate what the program for to-morrow is.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is my intention, when the proper time arrives, to have the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock. I presume the reading of the Farewell Address of Washington will be observed as heretofore, and afterwards we will go right along with the bill. That is my intention now. I think the urgency that is on us would cause us to go ahead with the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. To-morrow will be the 21st of February.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The 22d.

Mr. CUMMINS. The 21st. How can we celebrate Washington's Birthday on that day?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No one will know that it is the legislative day of the 21st but the Senate.

Mr. STONE. That is a legislative technicality. To-morrow will be February 22.

Mr. President, I desire to say a word, if I may at this time, about this memorial event. I do not look with favor upon the program outlined for to-morrow by my friend from South Carolina. According to that program the Farewell Address of George Washington will be read in accordance with an ancient custom upon the assembling of the Senate to-morrow. We are told that after that we are to go on with the ordinary legislative business of the Senate. There is to be no adjournment in honor of Washington. Only the other day, the 12th of this month, the Senate adjourned out of respect to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, that being his birthday. It was a very proper observance of that event, a very proper compliment to pay to that great American. Of all men in our history entitled to bear the distinguished cognomen of the "Great Commoner" is Abraham Lincoln. It is a distinction that has been applied in one way or another to many eminent Americans from the day of Henry Clay—it may be before that—to this time, but Abraham Lincoln is the one man above all in our history really entitled to wear that distinguished title. It belongs to him.

Mr. President, what I wish to say is that while we paid this well-deserved compliment to Abraham Lincoln by adjourning the Senate out of respect to his birthday, I can not but look with disfavor upon the program for to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Personally, the Chair has no control over the agreement. It is 5 minutes after 6 o'clock. The bill is before the Senate and has not been set aside.

Mr. STONE. Then I will take another occasion to say what I have to say about George Washington and why I think we should also adjourn the Senate in commemoration of his birth.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I move to strike out the last word.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending to which the Senator from Missouri has addressed himself. The Chair is not responsible for this agreement.

Mr. STONE. I move to amend that amendment by striking out the first word in it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know what the Senator from Missouri wants to strike out.

Mr. STONE. The first word of the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The word "section"?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that that is not in order.

Mr. STONE. What is the first word of the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. "That" is the first word.

Mr. STONE. I move to strike out the word "that."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that that is not in order. It is not an amendment which would leave anything if carried.

Mr. STONE. Then I move to strike out the first line of the amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I raise a point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has nothing to do with the germaneness of the amendment. The amendment is in order, and the Senator can proceed for five minutes.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish to say that I look with disfavor upon the suggestion that on to-morrow when the Senate meets and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] takes his place at the Secretary's desk and reads the last message that George Washington delivered to the American people, reads it on Washington's Birthday, that we shall then immediately go on with legislative current business. We ought to adjourn the Senate out of respect to Washington's memory, just as we did out of respect to the memory of Lincoln.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask the Senator if he will yield to me for just a moment? I wish to call his attention to the fact that the rule requires that we shall proceed with ordinary business as soon as the address has been read. That is in the rule of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It has always been done.

Mr. STONE. I know it is in the rule; I was not unaware of that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, if we choose to adjourn after the address is read we can do so.

Mr. STONE. Yes; and I am now proposing that we do then adjourn.

Mr. President, it is a poor compliment to the man who is supposed to stand first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen—the first of all Americans—that we merely read his Farewell Address to a half dozen Senators and to a scattered audience of a few curious onlookers in the galleries. How prone are we to forget the advice and admonitions of this greatest of all Americans! I not only want that address read to the Senate and to the country but to impress its dignity and wisdom, its soberness and its truth upon the Senate and the country and the world. If anything can be done by the Senate to impress the tremendous significance of that memorable address upon the American mind it should be done now if ever in our history. Can we not pay this simple compliment to George Washington as we paid a like well-deserved compliment to Abraham Lincoln?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator withhold that for just a moment while I offer an amendment in order that it may be printed for consideration to-morrow?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Very well.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer an amendment and ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I renew the motion.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a brief of Judge Cowan, of Texas, in relation to the pending bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How long is it?

Mr. GORE. Several pages.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe I will object to printing the paper in the RECORD, and I make the objection on account of the high cost and scarcity of print paper.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

CAPT. HARRY GRAHAM—BILL BECOMES A LAW.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that S. 1418, an act to authorize the President of the United States to appoint Harry Graham captain of Infantry, having been presented to the President on February 7, 1918, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the 10 days prescribed by the Constitution, it has become a law without his approval.

EFFECT OF BOLSHEVIKI DOCTRINES IN LABOR UNIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Monday next, at the close of the routine morning business, I shall ask permission to address the Senate upon the effect of the Bolsheviki doctrines in our labor unions upon production in the United States and the remedy of the country against those doctrines.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A FOREIGN BANK.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I give notice that on to-morrow, Friday, after the morning hour, I should like permission to address the Senate with regard to the establishment of a foreign bank——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire, if the Senator will permit me, whether there will be a session of the Senate to-morrow?

Mr. OWEN. Yes. Washington's Farewell Address will be read to the Senate by the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and then any other matter can be proceeded with that the Senate chooses to consider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHELAN in the chair). The Chair begs to remind the Senator from Oklahoma that it is the custom—and, indeed, under an order of the Senate—that the Farewell Address of Washington shall be read to-morrow.

Mr. OWEN. I so understand, Mr. President; and I understand also that it is the practice of the Senate to transact any business it may see fit to transact on that day. After the reading of the address I wish to make some remarks on the establishment of a foreign bank and the necessity for providing the merchants' commerce of the United States with international exchange and international credits.

PETITIONS.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of the Grand Chapter of Connecticut, Order of the Eastern Star, of Winsted, Conn., praying for the establishment of a league of nations to safeguard an enduring peace after the close of the present war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Retail Butchers and Grocers' Protective Association, of New Haven, Conn., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

Mr. SIMMONS. From the Committee on Finance, I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes. I wish to give notice that I shall submit a report (No. 286) to accompany the bill at a later day. I also desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill for consideration on Monday next, in the event that the pending bill, known as the railroad transportation bill, shall have been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

He also submitted an amendment providing that within two years after the conclusion of the existing war the buildings provided for shall be removed and parcels of land known as East Seaton Park and West Seaton Park, in the city of Washington, shall be attached to and become a part of the United States Botanic Garden, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to enroll as members of the Choctaw Tribe of Indians all persons identified as Mississippi Choctaws by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, under the provision of section 21 of the act of Congress approved June 28, 1898, and also to enroll all full-blooded Mississippi Choctaws not heretofore enrolled and all persons who may satisfactorily establish their rights as descendants of Choctaws, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GORE submitted an amendment providing that hereafter any moneys received by the United States in payment of charges fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture on account of cleaning and disinfecting of plants constructed therefor out of any appropriation made on account of the pink boll worm be appropriated and made immediately available during the continuance of such emergency, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agriculture appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the Sixty-eighth Annual Report of the Board of Directors of the Panama Railroad Co. for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 21, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., pastor of All Souls Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our Heavenly Father, Almighty and Everlasting God, who hast safely brought us to the beginning of this day, defend us in the same with Thy mighty power and direct us with Thine infinite wisdom. May all our deliberations, begun in Thy name, be continued in Thy fear and ended to Thy glory. So, our Father, may we labor until the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our God and of His Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CLARK of Florida rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Florida rise?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a tribute by a newspaper in my district to a young lieutenant killed in France.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an editorial from a Florida paper. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. JONES of Texas, have leave to extend his remarks by printing a letter that he wrote to the Committee on Foreign Affairs concerning a resolution that he introduced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. JONES] be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter that he wrote to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, that relates to some measure that is pending?

Mr. BLACK. Yes. I called attention to it before.

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

EXCESS-PROFITS TAX REGULATIONS NO. 41.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 36 (H. Rept. No. 328).

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed 500,000 copies of the war excess-profits tax regulations No. 41—150,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 350,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, the same to be distributed through the folding rooms.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. How long will it take to have these copies ready for distribution?

Mr. BARNHART. I have the assurance of the Printing Office this morning that they will go right at them. They are now delivering the last primers ordered a week ago, so that it may be a week before they are out.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

INCOME TAX REGULATIONS NO. 33, REVISED.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I submit another privileged resolution and ask its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged resolution?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 37 (H. Rept. No. 327).

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed 500,000 copies of the income-tax regulations No. 33, revised—150,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 350,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, the same to be distributed through the folding rooms.

The SPEAKER. Is not this the same resolution that was just passed?

Mr. BARNHART. No.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

STATUE OF JAMES BUCHANAN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the engrossed copy of the Buchanan Statue resolution.

The engrossed copy of House joint resolution 70 was read.

The SPEAKER. The question is——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit the resolution with instructions to the Committee on the Library to report the same back forthwith with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD moves to recommit by striking out all the remainder of the paragraph after the words "United States," page 1, line 7, down to the proviso, and inserting "on one of the public reservations generally known as 'small park areas' and which is entirely surrounded by streets in the city of Washington, D. C., to be selected by the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds and the Commission of Fine Arts."

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman hold that for five minutes, in view of the erroneous ruling made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]? Will he not withhold it for five minutes?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, this is to gratify the gentleman from Wisconsin, who was in such a desperate hurry yesterday to get to the consideration of the railroad bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is putting words in my mouth that I did not use, and he is attempting to deprive this House of fair play.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, when the previous question was ordered the motion would not be debatable anyway.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not a question of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The motion for the previous question is not debatable and never has been.

Mr. CRISP. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. The motion to recommit anyway would not be debatable, the previous question having been ordered on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This is a motion for the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. CRISP. The previous question is ordered on a motion to recommit for the purpose of cutting off amendments to the motion to recommit; but where the previous question is ordered on the passage of the bill, I think the motion to recommit is not debatable. That is the parliamentary inquiry that I desire to propound to the Chair.

Mr. GILLETT. It is debatable by unanimous consent.

Mr. CRISP. We can do anything by unanimous consent.

Mr. STAFFORD. If you will not allow three minutes to discuss a bona fide amendment——

Mr. GILLETT. Under the circumstances, I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] moves the previous question on the motion to recommit, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] makes the point of no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Fuller, Mass.	Lobeck	Rodenberg

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 349 Members, a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] be allowed five minutes to explain this motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] be allowed five minutes in which to express his opinion.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I hope that request will be granted. The gentleman has explained his reason.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the joint resolution as reported to the House provides for the location of this statue at Meridian Hill Park. In my motion to recommit, embodying the amendment which I sought to have voted upon yesterday, but when I was denied that privilege by reason of an erroneous ruling, this statue is to be located at a public reservation in one of the smaller park areas entirely surrounded by streets, of which there are numerous in different parts of the city. Regardless of the position which you may take as to whether the statue should be erected or not, it should at least, from my standpoint, and I think from the standpoint of the friends of the statue, be evident that we ought not to locate this statue of James Buchanan in the one public park that is destined to be rather historic as Washington grows in history. There are ample public reservations where the proposed statue could be erected, and even now these public reservations are being rapidly taken up. It will be only a question of time when we will have to put the ban on the allowance of further statues on public reservations to persons whose fame is of a more or less doubtful character. But I plead with all Members that Meridian Hill Park, out Sixteenth Street, be reserved for future statues of celebrities who have made names for themselves in the past or who are now making names for themselves in the present European war. There are plenty of other places which would be fitting for this statue of James Buchanan. I leave the selection of the place to the officer in charge of public buildings and the Commission of Fine Arts. I believe it is a bad practice for a committee to locate the site where this statue should be placed, especially when that committee may have been influenced by representatives from localities where some of the trustees under this will reside. The site should be selected by the Commission of Fine Arts in collaboration with the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds.

The Commission of Fine Arts should be allowed to determine what is a fitting place, and I can conceive of no more fitting place for a statue of James Buchanan than in one of these triangular parks. I merely rose to explain the purpose of the motion to recommit, and not wishing to take up any further time I submit the question for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on adopting the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were 96 ayes and 164 noes.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. WALSH. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 213, nays 127, answered "present" 3, not voting 85, as follows:

On motion of Mr. SLAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

STATUARY IN THE CAPITAL.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an address delivered by Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD on statuary in the Capital.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a copy of a memorandum of a dispatch to the Secretary of State of the United States from the envoy of the provisional government of Ireland, dated February 17, 1918. It is not very long.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter to the Secretary of State. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOHNSON of Washington for Friday and Saturday; and

To Mr. KRAUS (at the request of Mr. WOOD of Indiana), indefinitely, on account of sickness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for four minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for four minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9685, to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes. Pending that motion, I wish to know if we can not have some agreement in respect to the closing of general debate?

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any suggestion to make?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. I ask unanimous consent that all general debate on the pending bill close upon the rising of the committee this afternoon, not later than 6 or 6.30 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, we have lost almost an hour and a half already to-day. To-morrow there is a special order, which will take possibly an hour, and if the Committee on Invalid Pensions claims the day we may lose another half hour, so that I feel we can not agree to the proposition made by the gentleman from Tennessee. I have requests from members of the committee that will consume at least two hours and a half. Five members of the committee on this side have not yet debated the question. I have requests from 16 other Members of the House asking for time. I believe under the circumstances we should devote all day to-morrow to general debate, and I think we will make time by so doing.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, this measure is so important that I do not think we need to emphasize its importance. The unanimous-consent agreement under which we are considering the bill is that it shall be considered until concluded when taken up, with the exception of Calendar Wednesday and conference reports; so as far as pension matters are concerned they can be delayed. I do not know about the terms of the special order for to-morrow. I will make this further request, that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and that all general debate on the bill close not later than 3 o'clock to-morrow. That will give abundant time for any real discussion that is needed in general debate.

Mr. GILLETT. Why not wait until to-night before making that request?

Mr. SIMS. I desire that there may be as much liberality as possible when we come to consider the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule, and the time of gentlemen may be extended when talking not directly to what may be before the House, when Members are in much better attendance than they are in general debate. I hope the gentleman will agree to that request.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, so far all of the time that has been consumed upon the bill has been consumed by members of the committee.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no.

Mr. LENROOT. With two exceptions.

Mr. LANGLEY. Practically all of the time has been consumed by members of the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. Practically all of it, and to-day will be taken, I understand, by members of the committee. Does not the gentleman think there should be reasonable opportunity for those who are not members of the committee who desire to discuss this bill in general debate to do so?

Mr. SIMS. There are at least four hours and a half that we can devote to general debate to-day. That is two hours and a quarter on a side. If we meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, even if an hour should come out, that would give three hours for general debate to-morrow.

Mr. LENROOT. That is an hour and a half on a side. I want to say to the gentleman that I very much desire to have an hour, and I have stated to the gentleman what I personally desire. I want to have the time in general debate, because I think the committee will want to consider some of the suggestions that I have to make.

Mr. KITCHIN. Could not the gentleman from Tennessee give gentlemen on the other side two-thirds of his time to-morrow?

Mr. SIMS. I would want to reserve, in order to close, if need be, 30 minutes, but I will say right now that I shall yield one hour of the equal time to be disposed of as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] may see proper.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is not to-morrow pension day in the House?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; but the unanimous-consent agreement puts it out of the way.

Mr. LANGLEY. It is pension day, but it will not take very long.

Mr. GILLETT. Why does not the gentleman let the debate run to-day and make an agreement to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow for general debate, and then see how far we have gotten to-day, and see whether members of the committee have all used up their time, because I think the gentleman wants to be reasonable, and it is certainly fair that Members on this side of the House, outside of the committee, should get more than an hour and a half, it seems to me.

Mr. SIMS. Well, that is a matter entirely with that side of the House when I offer here to yield one hour and give them one hour more than consumed on this side, and have all the afternoon until 3 o'clock—I will make it 4 o'clock.

Mr. LENROOT. Make it all day.

Mr. SIMS. No; I will offer a motion to close debate rather than that; but I do hope the gentleman will consent to 4 o'clock, with the understanding that he may have an hour and a half the advantage of this side in the division of the time.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any other request to make?

Mr. SIMS. The request is this: I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and that all general debate on this bill close not later than 4 o'clock to-morrow, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] in the division of time to have one hour and a half more than this side.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me that a matter which the chairman has stated is of such great importance that there should not be any arrangement entered into whereby the committee have two whole days of general debate and the rest of the membership of this House be permitted to have only four hours of participation in general debate, and I think it is not unfair to ask that the whole of to-morrow be devoted to general debate, so that other Members who are just as well able to discuss this matter in general debate as some of the members of the committee, who have been unable to answer questions relating to the bill, may be heard; and therefore I shall object to the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that all general debate upon this bill—I mean the railroad-control bill—close not later than 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LANGLEY. That does not give enough time, I want to say to the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. This is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that general debate on this railroad bill shall close at 4 o'clock p. m. to-morrow.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer an amendment to make it not later than 6 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SIMS. I move the previous question on my motion——

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Massachusetts has been recognized proposing a substitute of 6 o'clock for 4 o'clock. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SIMS) there were—ayes 116, noes 62.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman want the 11 o'clock request submitted?

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, the motion as amended must be put.

The SPEAKER. Yes. The question is on the motion as amended.

The question was taken, and the motion as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOWELL. Was not the request to meet at 11 o'clock included in the motion?

The SPEAKER. No; the motion was only to close debate at 4 o'clock.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9685.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9685, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9685, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9685) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], a member of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, judging from the statements made by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts I am fully aware that this subject, which we are about to discuss, is one of great importance. He emphasized that fact by saying that he was quite sure that there were Members of the House, other than members of the committee, who were quite equal to the task of discussing this bill. I grant him that, because in the very outset of my remarks I desire to say that the importance and the gravity of this bill is of such momentous character that, even though I as a member of the committee have been engaged in hearings for almost four weeks, I do not have the temerity to say that I am entirely able to discuss comprehensively and lucidly the provisions of this bill. The importance of it is beyond question, and perhaps in the outstart it might be well to refer to some matters that make it so important for the earnest consideration of this great body. In the first place, the property rights of the railroad companies amount in the aggregate, roughly estimating the same, to over $18,000,000,000 in this country, and this legislation will vitally affect that tremendous amount of property interest. The mere statement of that fact is sufficient to warrant me in stating that this is one of the most important bills presented to this Congress. Again, there are 1,700,000 employees engaged by these railroad companies. Who would dare to assert in contradiction that their interests should not be conserved and preserved, and if that be true, then again the importance of this great measure must become apparent to you. Added to that you should remember that there are over 250,000 miles of railroad lines in this country that must be affected by this legislation. Added to that fact is another which is quite important, and that is that there are hundreds of thousands of stockholders in these corporations whose moneyed interests will be vitally affected by the passage or the nonpassage of this bill. And so whilst one perhaps is able, after hearings held in committee, to have some general knowledge of the subject that he is about to discuss, I am very frank to say to this membership that I am quite aware of my own deficiencies. I claim no pride of authorship in this bill, nor do I attempt to assert that it is a perfect bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would make the suggestion that the gentleman has omitted from his list of those who are vitally interested the 110,000,000 people in the United States.

Mr. DEWALT. If the gentleman from Illinois had permitted me a moment, I would have referred to that as perhaps the most important of all the considerations, and I am very glad the gentleman introduced it just the moment that he did. The great question of rates in this controversy is certain to be raised, and, after all, in the ultimate conclusion, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit me to suggest, it is the consumer who ultimately pays the freight. And it is entirely suggestive and proper that the gentleman from Illinois should say that 110,000,000 people are vitally interested in this legislation, because as the rates are changed, either for freight or passenger traffic, or as the management of these roads is changed ultimately, the people—men, women, and children—throughout the country must, in the popular expression used, "pay the freight."

Now, let us drop for a moment, if you please, the consideration of the importance of this legislation. The next thought that occurs to me, and possibly will occur to you, is, logically, admitting the importance of it, where is the necessity for it? The necessity for it became quite apparent to every man who had the situation in hand, and particularly and strongly apparent to the membership of this committee. The whole Nation knew, and everyone now is convinced, of the fact that the railroad systems of the country had, according to popular expression, "broken down." Freight traffic, passenger traffic, all sorts of transportation facilities, were congested and for the time being almost at a standstill. What were the causes of this great discomfort to the people of this country? Was it the fault of the Government? No one could fairly charge that that was true. Was it the fault of the railroads? Partially so; yes. I think an affirmative answer could be given to that proposition. But there were other reasons which were momentous and almost paramount in regard to this great disaster that fell upon the country almost overnight. What were they?

There was a tremendous demand for transportation. When the war came on, and when we were preparing for entrance into the war, it became necessary to make shipments almost beyond comparison with the shipments that had been made in years prior to our proposed entrance into the contest. The natural consequence was that freight traffic was congested. And the sequence of that congestion, and the sequence also of the demand of the Government for shipments of war munitions, led to priority orders, and priority orders meant in substance that governmental shipments should take precedence of all other shipments. And for that reason, and for other reasons consequent thereon, there was this congestion in freight and passenger traffic. Added to that was the apparent desire, futile in the end, of the railroad managers to help the Government; and you will remember better perhaps than I can tell you, that there was a War Board of Railroads established, which War Board of Railroads, consisted of the general managers and presidents of the various roads of the country. To their credit, and I desire to voice that sentiment now, be it said, that they did the best they could under the circumstances, and they displayed loyalty and public spirit which deserves the recognition of the people of this country. Unfortunately, however, they were hampered. They were unable to do that which the Government desired and which they were willing to do. How were they hampered? They were hampered by the Sherman law, and they were constrained by the rules and regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Priority shipments were clearly against the provisions of these two methods of regulation. The routing of freight was clearly against the provisions of the Interstate Commerce regulations, and they did under the law the best they could, but it was finally found that it was entirely inefficient, and that in order to render the service that the Government demanded, and in order to serve the public at the same time, it became necessary to do what?

It became necessary in the judgment of the Government itself, and of the committee acting under the authority of this House, to devise some means by which these rules and regulations should either be made lax, made wider, if you please, or entirely abrogated. Perhaps no more explicit and suggestive illustration of this fact can be shown than that of demurrage. There is not a man within the hearing of my voice who does not know that there were thousands of freight cars that were used as storage places. They were filled with freight; they arrived at terminal stations and remained unloaded, not only for days but sometimes for weeks. And the fact was disclosed in the hearings that sometimes these cargoes of freight in these cars were sold and resold, and again sold and resold, without ever being unloaded. All of this resulted, as I am trying to show you, in this great disaster to the transportation systems of the country.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. DENISON. I was going to ask the gentleman right at that point if he does not think that situation could have been met by Congress repealing those regulations and suspending the Sherman law?

Mr. DEWALT. It could have been met in that way, and that was suggested by the Interstate Commerce Commission itself, and there were two remedies, one of which you suggest and that which is now proposed. I am frank to admit that, sir. And in this discussion I beg pardon, gentlemen, for desiring, if possible, to answer all pertinent questions which may be submitted to me, disclaiming to have any more knowledge than anybody else has upon the subject, and I am quite sure that if the questions be relevant, material, and pertinent I will receive information and perhaps be able in my modest way to impart some.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Right in this connection, in touching the causes of the congestion, I am interested to know what the gentleman's views are in reference to how far the diversion of traffic from other ports to New York contributed to that condition?

Mr. DEWALT. I think you had better put that, sir, in the other way. "Nondiversion" to those ports would, in my judgment, be a more explicit term. It is true that the port of New York, by the natural influx and reflex of trade in this country, is the greatest port in the country; and it is also true, and shown by the testimony in some of these hearings that the ports of Charleston, Savannah, New Orleans, and Philadelphia, if you please, also included, do not have the terminal facilities that New York has. They do not have the depth of water for large vessels, and the natural consequence is that trade seeks its easiest channel. It is like the flowing of the blood in the human body. If the veins are congested the blood does not readily flow, and the system become affected or possibly ceases its functions. And the question is very pertinent from the fact that if Savannah, Charleston, and New Orleans, and Philadelphia, too, if you please, in my own State, had the terminal facilities and the depth of water, which possibly they have not, a great deal of this freight would be diverted from New York and would go to those other ports.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. WHALEY. You say the diversion of traffic from those ports was because of the lack of water at those ports. Is it not a matter of fact that those ports have that depth of water?

Mr. DEWALT. I understand the gentleman from South Carolina has received an appropriation quite monumental, in its aggregate, which will give the required depth of water at Charleston.

Mr. WHALEY. I would like to correct that. There is a depth of water already there sufficient to float any ship of the United States or any that England sends over here with the exception of the Mauretania.

Mr. DEWALT. I hope it will be increased to a depth of 35 feet and the appropriation in like proportion.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman ought to advise the committee that Philadelphia has an assured high-tide depth now of 35 feet, and is capable of accommodating twice as much business as goes into that port, and that it has terminal and docking facilities sufficient to take over a vast part of the business that now clogs New York.

Mr. DEWALT. I entirely agree with the gentleman, and yet strange it is that the general public throughout the West has an idea that Philadelphia has not the requisite terminal facilities and the proper depth of water.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the West is not quite that much in error and that they know something about the depth of water at Philadelphia. But regardless of that, is not the gentleman aware of the fact that it is now conceded that a great mistake was made in sending so much freight to New York, and that arrangements have been made for its diversion to these other ports to a very considerable extent?

Mr. DEWALT. I am very glad that is so.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I would say that the misinformation throughout the country as to the port of Philadelphia was in no wise due to a lack of diligence and repeated statements on the part of the distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. MOORE], of whom I have distinct recollections on several occasions as having mentioned, first, that there was such a port as Philadelphia and that the port was made up largely of water, and, second, that it was of great depth, corresponding therewith to his arguments and his speeches delivered here on the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. DEWALT. Well, I do not want to reply to that at all, except to say this: That the gentlemen who reside in the beloved city from which the gentleman from Philadelphia comes are largely of the Quaker element and are always very modest; they are not like those of the West and they do not blow their horns so loudly. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course I thank the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] and the equally distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] for the fine personal compliments they have paid to me, but I would like the gentleman to permit me to incorporate in his remarks this fact, that Boston has a depth of 35 feet, that Baltimore has a depth of 35 feet, that Philadelphia has a depth of 35 feet, that Charleston has a depth of at least 30 feet, that Savannah has a depth of 30 feet, and so on down the line; as all those ports south of New York are nearer to the West than New York is, it is not strange that people should wonder why all the business of the West and of the South should be concentrated at the port of New York.

Mr. DEWALT. Whatever the reason is, the fact is quite apparent, and the result is the same. I am very glad that my colleague from Pennsylvania has given not only me but the House and the committee the information that it is so important for the people at large to know.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. When the gentleman was diverted he was discussing the limitations caused by the accumulation of cars on the sidings and the use of them for storehouse purposes instead of for transportation. That was not caused by any provision of law. That condition might have been remedied by the railroad companies themselves, might it not?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman also referred to the fact that under the provisions of the Interstate Commerce law—and I think he mentioned section 6—there were certain limitations which prevented the railroad companies from developing their system and making them as efficient as they may be under this legislation.

Mr. DEWALT. I did not mention the section, but that was my idea; yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would like to ask the gentleman to develop that thought and tell us just what those provisions are; in other words, why these roads under private ownership could not be developed and utilized just as well as if those limitations were removed and the roads taken out of governmental control?

Mr. DEWALT. The only question that arises here, if the gentleman will permit me, is this, that in spite of the fact that we have a demurrage system, and in spite of the fact that the Government and the railroads themselves have been very assiduous in collecting this demurrage, the shippers of freight are willing to pay the demurrage in order to have the storage facilities of the cars. They simply laugh at the idea of demurrage, because they think it cheaper to pay the demurrage than to take the freight off the cars in proper time except as that time suits their convenience. That is the truth of it.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Is it not a fact that the railroads themselves utilize a great many cars for storage purposes?

Mr. DEWALT. I am sorry to say that I think that is so. I am not here with any bill or brief for the railroad companies, nor do I excuse them at all for their laxity in not enforcing the rules which they themselves have made—and the regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission. But there is very little use, gentlemen, in decrying these evils or blaming John or James for the existence thereof. We have a condition confronting us, and the question is, How are we to remedy it? Not "Who is to blame?" Not "Why he or it is to blame?" But the blame being here, and the condition existing, the question is, "What is the best thing to do under the circumstances?"

Now, let me proceed for a moment further, leaving that phase of the topic and going to another: Admitting the importance of the subject we are discussing, and admitting, if you please, the necessity for the legislation, as we have tried to point out, how did the legislation come about? And how is it that we now have before us this bill?

It came about in this way. You will recollect it, perhaps, without any refreshment of your memory on my part. In 1916 there was a bill enacted into law entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes." In that appropriation bill was the following section:

The President, in time of war, is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system or systems or transportation, or any part thereof, and to utilize the same, to the exclusion as far as may be necessary of all other traffic thereon, for the transfer or transportation of troops, war material and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable.

That act was passed August 29, 1916, and, gentlemen, I desire to enforce upon your attention this very momentous thing, that although in the judgment of a great many eminent lawyers, some of whom I have consulted, the President, under the provisions of the act of 1916, had the authority and the right then and there to take possession of and assume control of the railroad systems of this country, he did not do that. Why did he not do it? Of course, again I may say, I hold no brief for the President of the United States, but the very fact that he did not do so is evidence to my mind that he was using the best of sound judgment in preparing the country at large for this momentous action when he must take over the railroad systems of the country. I have heard it said here that this was an assumption of authority by the President of the United States that was almost autocratic in its exercise. I grant you we have proceeded along the lines of almost revolutionary processes; I grant you that an old-line Democrat like myself, reared with the idea that the Constitution must be strictly conserved and observed, is sometimes frightened, almost appalled, at these momentous powers that are given to the Executive. But the very fact that the President did not exercise them when he had the right to exercise them, if he saw fit, and that he waited all this time, until it became quite apparent to him and the country at large that it must be done, is good assurance to me that he did not desire and never assumed autocratic powers. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly, sir.

Mr. FORDNEY. In section 6, page 9, of the bill there is this language:

From said revolving fund the President may expend such an amount as he may deem necessary or desirable for the purchase, construction, or utilization and operation of canals, boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities on the inland, canal, and coastwise waterways, and may in the acquisition, operation, and use of such facilities create or employ such agencies and enter into such contracts and agreements as he shall deem in the public interest.

Does the gentleman think in order to carry on this war it is necessary that the Government should purchase inland canals that will not admit ships?

Mr. DEWALT. If the gentleman will permit me to answer that question when I get to the discussion of the different sections of the bill, I will be very much obliged; but the power to purchase inland canals is, in my judgment, not contemplated in the act.

Mr. FORDNEY. I shall be very glad to do it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. No; not for the present. I know the gentleman is very much interested in the subject of inland waterways, and his knowledge is authority on that subject.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but should like through him to remind the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] that hundreds of barges laden with lumber have been using some of the canals referred to, while others have been delayed because the railroads were incapable of taking their cargoes, with the result that ship construction has been held up and the war has not proceeded as rapidly as it should.

Mr. DEWALT. Now, resuming the thought that was in my mind, gentlemen, after this provision in the appropriation bill of 1916 was incorporated into the law, then there was this period of preparation, as I have tried to illustrate. And then there followed what? A proclamation by the President of the United States, in which he said that he would do what?

Take possession and assume control at 12 o'clock noon on the 28th day of December, 1917, of each and every system of transportation and the appurtenances thereof located wholly or in part within the boundaries of the continental United States and consisting of railroads and owned or controlled systems of coastwise and inland transportation engaged in general transportation, whether operated by steam or by electric power including also terminals, terminal companies, and terminal associations, sleeping and parlor cars, private cars and private car lines, elevators, warehouses, telegraph and telephone lines, and all other equipment and appurtenances commonly used upon or operated as a part of such rail or combined rail-and-water systems of transportation.

We then have as a consummation of these facts that I have tried to give you, first, the importance of the legislation; second, the necessity of it; third, the passage of the act of 1916; and fourth, the proclamation of the President of the United States. We have this fact, that now the President is in actual control of the railroad systems of this country. Why do I try to emphasize that statement? I emphasize it, gentlemen, for this reason, that it brings me to the discussion now in regular order of the bill itself. When the President took over the railroads, as we say in popular terms, when he assumed control and took possession thereof, he was taking private property for public use, and, as we all know, the Constitution provides that there must be payment for such taking. The question then naturally came to the mind of the legislator as well as to the mind of the Executive, What means can be best devised to pay this stipulated sum or, if not stipulated, how shall this remuneration be made?

If it were a complete taking over, if it were not only an occupation but a confiscation or a commandeering, which meant not only the use but the actual possession of the property for an indefinite or a definite time, which meant ownership, the question might be easier of solution, because it would amount to an appraisal of the value of the property, an appraisal of the franchise, and other concomitant features which go into such an appraisal, and then a lump sum could be paid by the Government for such taking. But this taking is different. This is the taking of the use for a time. What is that time? For and during the war, and for such a reasonable time thereafter, not exceeding a stipulated time, to wit, two years after the ratification of the treaty of peace.

It therefore became, in the mind of every sensible man who was studying this situation, a startling question as to what should be paid. There were several theories presented. I do not desire at this time, nor do I have the time to cover the several theories that were presented to the committee. But this bill provides a specific method of arriving at what should be paid to the different railroad companies.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield in this connection?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. LAZARO. In explaining this feature of the bill will the gentleman explain how the British handled that feature of it when they took possession of their railroads?

Mr. DEWALT. I shall be very glad to, as well as I am able, sir. The Government of Great Britain had an act passed in 1871 which gave the Government the right to take over, without any further proceedings, the railroads in the United Kingdom. When the war came, in 1914, the Government took over the railroads. It was first asserted that they did it without any regard or agreement as to compensation, but they did afterwards make an agreement. They made an agreement in the spring after the war in August, 1914. They have continued the operation and extended the power week by week. Instead of for a time limited they extend the power week by week.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Every two weeks.

Mr. DEWALT. Every two weeks is it? Pardon me for saying one. The first system was for a pooling of railroad income. They paid to the lines for operating the amount that they had received for the years 1914 and 1913, dependent in amount as to whether the business of the first six or seven months of 1914 was in excess of the business done in the last six months of 1913.

After pooling all these rates, both for passenger and freight traffic, they divided the receipts in proportion to the amount of earnings the various roads had had prior to that time. That arrangement was again changed for what was called an inclusion of the bonus system. The labor agitation came on, and the laborers on the railroads insisted that they must have higher pay. The Government then said that they would guarantee a 25 per cent increase to the laborers on the railroads, and the amount given to the railroads was not made less by reason of the bonus, for the Government stood for the bonus. That bonus has again been increased 10 per cent and includes not only the male laborers but the females in the railroad offices taking the place of male employees.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. I find that there are a number of small railways in Missouri that believe—whether it is true or not I do not know—that the action of taking the larger systems, to the exclusion of the short lines, is going to drive them into bankruptcy. Will the gentleman discuss the wisdom of the order or the law that excludes from operation under the Government of these small roads?

Mr. DEWALT. I will be pleased to do so hereafter.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. My inquiry is suggested by the reply of the gentleman to the gentleman from Louisiana in reference to the labor troubles in England. I would like to ask the gentleman if he remembers the fact that there was a threatened and impending strike among the railroad employees of this country just before the President issued his program in December?

Mr. DEWALT. I am not certain about that.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not think there was any threatened strike; they did make a demand for increase of wages.

Mr. DEWALT. I do not think that since the passage of the Adamson bill there has been any threatened strike on the part of the employees of the railroads.

Mr. DENISON. Perhaps it was in the form of a general demand for increased wages.

Mr. DEWALT. There has been a demand for increased wages—the first demand was 40 per cent, but that has been graduated to 20 per cent, and I think gentlemen who represent the railroads and the unions have agreed upon some tentative proposition.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman think that the demand for a decided increase of wages that was made at the time had anything to do with precipitating the action of taking over the railroads?

Mr. DEWALT. I do not think it had a particle of effect. I do not think it was a moving consideration in the minds of either the Executive or his advisers. It is a clear business proposition, and that is all this is, coupled with a legal liability that a party always has when he takes private property for himself, or when the Government takes private property for public use. That is the legal proposition, and it is a business proposition as well. The only question, in my judgment, that there is before this House at this time which is of great moment is how we can best determine what the remuneration shall be, taken in connection with the other things that are concerned with that vital question. If this is so, then let us proceed in the limited time I have to a discussion of the provisions of this bill.

When I spoke of the pay of the railroad companies for the use of their lines I stated in the same breath this legal proposition that when they were deprived, even for a moment, of their property rights, they are entitled to compensation. Whether the time be 1 year or 10 years, the primal question is, What shall be paid?

In this bill the committee has provided for what is known as the standard return. What is the standard return? The standard return can perhaps be best defined by giving you what I have tried to get out of the act itself. It is the annual average railway operating income, including income of lines acquired by lease of or connected with the carrier, between July 1, 1914, and December 31, 1917, for the three years ending June 30, 1917; and the rate per cent to be fixed by the President upon the cost of any additions or betterments, less retirements or road extensions, made during the six months ending December 31, 1917. Now that is the standard return as laid down by this act.

What does it amount to in figures? The net operating income of the roads in class 1—and that includes all the roads whose income was over $1,000,000 a year—was $1,020,800,000. That was for 1917. In 1916 the net income of these roads in class 1 was $984,872,959. In 1915, which was what the railroad companies called the lean year, the net income was $683,104,833.

Add these three amounts together and you have $2,688,777,792, and dividing that by 3 you have $896,254,264, which is the average net operating income for these three years for this class 1 railroad, to wit, the railroads whose annual income was over $1,000,000 a year. But there were other railroads that were not of class 1, namely, railroads that did not earn $1,000,000 a year.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. How much of the total mileage of the country is included in class 1?

Mr. DEWALT. I am not able to give the gentleman that. The total mileage operated in 1917 on all of the railroads was about 230,000 miles. The total in 1916 was 257,000 miles, in round numbers. I can give the gentleman that exactly, if he will wait a moment.

Mr. BORLAND. I know the total mileage of the country is approximately 250,000 miles, but I was wondering how much of it was included in class 1.

Mr. DEWALT. Perhaps another way of answering the gentleman's question is this: Class 1 earned and received about 96 per cent of the total income of all of the roads, but as to the mileage I can not give you the exact figures.

Mr. CRISP. Would the gentleman mind giving us the per cent that the roads in class 1 earned, or has the gentleman reduced that to percentages?

Mr. DEWALT. That differs so variously and so radically that one could not estimate that; but if this figure were to be divided by the property valuation used in operation by all the roads in class 1, it would give them an average percentage of about 5.6 on their property.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is that based upon the amount of capital actually invested?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; their operating property. As I tried to say before the interruption, this figure of $896,000,000, in round numbers, did not include the average operating income of these roads that were not in class 1, and the Interstate Commerce Commission and others who were advising with the framers of this bill included a sum for them which made the total about $935,000,000, which is a basis of payment if this agreement is carried into effect by the President of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. How does the percentage for those three years compare with the percentage for the years immediately preceding, say, 1913, 1912, and 1911?

Mr. DEWALT. In some of the years preceding 1912 the gross earnings were larger, though not larger than 1917, because that was the banner year. Nineteen hundred and nine was a lean year, if I recollect; 1912 was a lean year, as the railroad men call it, and the scale of gradation runs up and down, best illustrated by a map that was presented to the committee itself, showing that in some years whilst the gross receipts were enhanced the net income did not materially increase, by reason of the greater expense in operation and the greater cost for material.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman state about what per cent of this net income finally went to the pockets of the stockholders?

Mr. DEWALT. I can tell that pretty nearly.

Mr. SWITZER. Not all of it, as I understand it?

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, no. The gross earnings of these roads were $3,824,419,739. The operating expenses, and this will give the gentleman a clue to what he desires to know, were $2,581,838,511, leaving a net, after the payment of taxes, which amounted to $172,830,714, of $1,069,750,514, which was for the payment of dividends and for the payment of the interest on the bonds. When the gentleman asked me the question how much went into the pockets of the stockholders and the bondholders, not being fortunate enough to own any stock or bonds of railroad companies, I really can not answer the question.

Mr. SWITZER. Is it not true that a great part of this went back into betterments?

Mr. DEWALT. Some part of it did.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, this may throw a little light on the question asked by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER]: The bonded indebtedness of the carriers is $10,000,000,000, on which was paid $450,000,000, with interest. The amount paid in dividends was from $250,000,000 to $300,000,000, and that would leave a balance of possibly $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 for surplus, fixed betterments, and so on.

Mr. SWITZER. About one-fourth, then?

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to hurry on, as I have promised, as well as I may, to touch one other question which some gentleman asked me here on the left. Before we get to that, however, how do we ascertain this standard return? The standard return is ascertained, according to the provisions of the bill, by taking the debits and credits arising from the accounts in the monthly reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is the basis, including equipment rents and joint facility rents, and then the standard return also includes the cost of additions and betterments, railroad extensions, and they are to be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission from reports, books, and other data of the carriers, and these are to be certified to the President. What is the result? The result is this, that after you have fixed a basis for the standard return as outlined in one of the provisions of section 1, you determine almost in the same breath how that ascertainment shall be arrived at, and how is it? Not by the railroad companies themselves, not by the President, if you please, not by the Director General, but by the Interstate Commerce Commission from their reports which have been submitted to them by the railroad companies, and which they have supervised, and which, they have ratified. So that there can be no question either about the validity of the ascertainment nor about the justice of the ascertainment, provided always you agree with me in saying that the Interstate Commerce Commission is a body which is reasonable and just and loyal and conservative of the Government's interests. Now, this certificate as furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be conclusive as to the amount for the purposes of this agreement.

This same section 1—and I am hurrying along—provides further that Federal taxes under the act of October 3, 1917, assessed for the time beginning January 1, 1918, shall be paid by the carrier or charged against the sum known as the standard return, and other taxes shall be paid out of the revenue derived from the railway operations whilst under Federal control. All taxes before January 1, 1918, shall be paid out of the carrier's funds or charged against the standard returns and deducted therefrom. In other words, the Government will pay the tax whilst it is operating the roads, but the railroad companies will pay the taxes which ought to have been paid or which were assessed against them prior to the date specified and that I have just mentioned.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. Is there any provision in the bill in reference to taking care of these taxes except in cases where an agreement is made with the railroad?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes, sir; there is.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman point it out?

Mr. DEWALT. I will come to that in a few moments. We then follow in this section 1 a stipulation as to maintenance. Everyone knows who is engaged at all with railroad legislation or with railroad operation, or even though he be but a mere traveler upon a railroad, that there must be betterments for maintenance, there must be extensions, there must be repairs, there must be, if you please, the acquirement of new motive power and new cars.

So this section 1 provides that maintenance, repairs, renewals, depreciation shall be considered so that the carriers' property may be returned. How? That the carriers' property may be returned to the owners thereof when this period of Government control is ended substantially in the same condition as when it was taken from them. Certainly no more equitable provision can be had than that. If I take the property of John Jones by right of eminent domain, if you please—but that is not quite a relevant comparison—but if I take the property of an individual for a certain time, with a promise to return it to him, I should return it in the same condition that I obtained it, or I should pay for the depreciation in the value thereof by reason of my use. Therefore, this provision of the bill provides that in regard to maintenance and betterments they shall be substantially replaced to the road in the same condition as it was at the time the Government took the control. Now, further than that, section 1 provides only one important feature, and that is as to nonoperating roads or those in the hands of receivers, and there the President may make such agreements with such corporations as are equitable.

Now, what do we mean by "nonoperating roads"? There were certain roads which were not entirely completed. There were certain roads which were in process, if you please, of stabilization and required betterments, and therefore were not able to operate as going concerns. There were other roads in the hands of receivers, and it was deemed best by the authorities who drew the bill, and also by the committee itself to place in the bill some stipulation to meet that emergency and that condition, and that is met by saying that as to those particular roads the President may make such an agreement as to him seems equitable under the supervision of the Director General of Railroads. Now, that condition contemplates something which is also of very great moment. This lays out the general plan of how the standard return shall be established; it lays out the constituent parts that go into the standard return. It specifies, if you please, that the Interstate Commerce Commission by the reports submitted to it by the railroad companies shall effectually and eventually determine what the rates have been and upon which this standard return is based, and all this contemplates something which is not fully explained unless I say something else to you. What is that? It contemplates an agreement between the railroad companies and the President of the United States. In other words, after the standard return is fixed by this process that I have tried to demonstrate to you, then the President goes to the carrier company and says, "Here is the standard return, fixed according to the reports that you have made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, graduated according to the process that is named in this bill. I offer to you an agreement now that we will pay to you this sum. I can not pay you in excess thereof, but I will pay you that as a maximum amount and I want you to agree with me, as I have taken over the road."

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. STEELE. As I understand the bill, there are two methods of compensation provided. One is the judicial proceeding where the parties can not agree, and the other where they do agree. Now, does the method of the agreement provided here for compensation conform with the legal measure of damages?

Mr. DEWALT. It does, sir. In answer to that let me say this, that in every legal proceeding—as the gentleman knows far better than I do, as I concede to him greater ability as a lawyer than I have ever claimed—as the gentleman well knows, and every other Member knows, the legal standard for the assessment of damages is this: What was the property worth at the time of the taking? That is the general broad proposition. Now, when we come down to pay damages for the use of property, then we have the same standard. What was the use worth at the time of taking? And therefore it follows as a logical conclusion of the answer to the gentleman's question that the legal standard of payment would be what was its use worth at the time, and that is to be determined, how? Why, by what it actually brought in; what it earned.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. I am going to ask the gentleman this question: Of course, we all agree that the rule established by the courts is when property is taken the value of it must be established at the time when it is taken. When we take over the use the gentleman says that is also to be established at the time of the taking. Is not that, however, subject to this modification, when you come to consider the question of use it must extend over a period of time, and for that reason there is no other standard except we shall take in the preceding years or months or days, or whatever may be proper for the purpose of determining what period of time the use is?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. So it is hardly strictly true. I will ask the gentleman, to say that we determine the use of the property as of the time of the taking.

Mr. DEWALT. No; but my dear sir, if the gentleman will take in connection that which I have just stated in reference to the establishment of the standard return, he will notice at once that the bill contemplates the taking in the receipts for three years and out of them making an average.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes. We say to the railroads under the terms of this bill: We are willing to determine its use by this standard which we offer you. Now, you have the right to take it or refuse it——

Mr. DEWALT. I am going to come to that in a moment. I will now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL].

Mr. DOWELL. I take it from the gentleman's argument that some of these roads are not receiving the same income that others are receiving.

Mr. DEWALT. That is certainly so.

Mr. DOWELL. There are two methods that are adopted: One is by agreement and the other a remedy in the courts. Is it not true that the roads receiving the large incomes under this provision will accept the agreement and those receiving a less sum will refuse the agreement and obtain theirs through the courts?

Mr. DEWALT. Well, in answer to that, I would say to the gentleman that there is nothing more dangerous in the world than prophecy. I have never yet been able to prophesy as to what I myself would do on the morrow, and I can not tell what they would do the next day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. May I have 15 minutes' additional time?

Mr. SIMS. I yield 15 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. DEWALT. I am sorry, gentlemen, if I have wearied you, and I apologize for taking all of the time that I have taken.

I proceed now, gentlemen, to section 3 of this bill, which provides that in case the President of the United States and the carriers are not able to agree, then what follows? The scheme is carried out. First, we try to agree with the carrier companies. The reason for that is that we desire by this bill to prevent litigation, and certainly nothing could be more desirable at this time than to prevent and forestall, if you please, litigation. And so every means is to be used by the executive authority to arrive at this agreement.

But suppose the carrier company says, "We will not agree," or suppose the President says that the demands are excessive according to the circumstances, or the standard return, if you please, in regard to this one particular road is excessive at this particular time; and the parties to this agreement do not agree? In other words, they agree to disagree. Then what follows? The bill then provides that three referees shall be chosen. Chosen by whom? Not by the President; chosen not by the carrier companies, but chosen by an impartial body, namely, the Interstate Commerce Commission. And these three men then shall determine the rights of these contending parties. The bill also provides that any member of the Interstate Commerce Commission may serve as a referee or that anyone connected in official capacity with the Interstate Commerce Commission also shall have the right to serve if chosen. If then the reference is made, which is compulsory, of course, and the parties do not agree, what follows? Still the rights of the corporation are preserved, and still the rights of the Government are preserved. How? By referring the matter for final adjudication to the Court of Claims. That is the last resort; but the whole design of this bill—the whole desire, as expressed throughout the bill—is to prevent as much litigation as possible, and to keep these railroad companies and the executive authority of the United States, and the Government itself, in such a position that litigation will not be necessary. I need not emphasize the importance of that, gentlemen. It is apparent to the mind of everyone who knows anything at all about the subject. Litigation—unprovoked, perhaps, in some instances; provoked in other instances—might possibly lead to the disruption of the transportation systems on the one hand or financial disaster on the other.

I pass over section 4 and section 5, although I have them noted here and would like to discuss them, and come down to the question of what is known as the revolving fund, which is section 6.

This bill provides that $500,000,000, not otherwise appropriated, shall be appropriated for the purpose—of what? The expression is very clear in the bill. The revolving fund of $500,000,000 is for operating expenses, and with the revenue derived from the operation of the road shall be used—for what? For just compensation of the railroads under control, or terminals, motive power, cars, equipment, and so forth. And the President may do what else? The President may order the road to make betterments and road extensions, and so forth, for road purposes, and may advance the cost thereof from the revolving fund for such betterments and extensions, and charge the same up against the carrier.

Now, I have heard some gentlemen in committee, as well as out of it, say, "Oh, well, this will inevitably lead to this, that the railroads will receive these betterments, receive these extensions, will receive these large improvements, at the expense of the Government, and then when the railroads are turned over they will have the benefits thereof without payment to the Government." No more ridiculous statement was ever made by anyone in regard to the provisions of a bill if he reads and syllogizes the bill itself. Because the revolving fund is specified at $500,000,000, and the revenue derived from the operation of the roads by the Government shall be taken for the purpose specified, to wit, for betterments and improvements, and for the payment of a just compensation to the roads, and, more than that, the President can order and direct that these betterments and improvements shall be made and charged up against the standard return.

I pass now to the question that was asked me in reference to the short-line railroad by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL]. And permit me to say that I believe that portion of the controversy is no longer one that need agitate the minds of those who are interested in short-line railroads. Section 9, referring to this matter, is as follows:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the routing instructions—

And I emphasize "routing instructions"— over, and the traffic arrangements—

Emphasizing again, "traffic arrangements"— of such railroads as may not be taken under Federal control by the President unless such arrangements and instructions prejudice—

What? Here are the two exceptions—the transportation of war materials or of Government supplies; in which cases—

And only in which cases, according to the provisions of this section—

the President may change the routing of such materials and supplies as the war and national interests demand.

And certainly that is a wise and patriotic provision.

And now, further:

If the President should deem it necessary temporarily to suspend such arrangements and instructions as to freight other than war materials and Government supplies he may thereafter, so far as practicable, cause to be diverted—sufficient unrouted freight to such road as will compensate it in revenue for such temporary suspension.

Mr. RUSSELL. Now, that is the best provision that has been made there that is possible under the circumstances, and that is when the road is not taken over; but you notice that the section reads that the President may, as far as practicable, reroute other freights that might make up the loss to that road. But the mere fact that that may not be done, as I am informed, has already tended to reduce the value of stocks and bonds of some of these smaller lines, very much to their injury, I am informed, and they fear may result in driving them into the hands of receivers and into bankruptcy.

Does not the gentleman appreciate that there is a possibility of very great injury being done to those smaller lines if they are not taken over?

Mr. DEWALT. I do. One gentleman who appeared before the committee was president of one of the so-called short lines and the receiver of another; I think he came from Pittsburgh. His name I have forgotten. But he emphasized to the committee this important fact, saying in substance: "I am speaking for these short-line roads, in which I am interested, and there are others who take the same view. I, speaking for them, desire only two things: First, that their traffic arrangements, as now provided for by the Interstate Commerce Commission, shall remain practically as they are, to wit, that we shall be entitled to a proportionate rate for the service we have rendered; and secondly, that if there be freight diverted from our lines as feeder lines to trunk lines, we receive such rate in return, if it is possible to give it to us; and third"—which I do not think has been mentioned in the argument at all by anybody who has asked me a question—"that motive power and transportation facilities be given us as heretofore."

That is all they seem to be interested in, and it was with that view that this provision was drawn. And it was drawn, I believe—although I am not authorized to say so positively—by gentlemen who are interested in the short lines. I appreciate fully that these short lines are built, capitalized, and owned largely by local stockholders in the localities in which they are constructed.

Mr. RUSSELL. I understand, if the gentleman pleases, that there are about 800 of these short lines in the country?

Mr. DEWALT. I so understand.

Mr. RUSSELL. Several of them are in my district, built by the local people. As this great harm will come to them, I wondered why that situation should not be remedied so as to include them.

Mr. DEWALT. The only remedy, in my judgment, would be to take them all over; and there, I fear, the remedy would be worse than the evil.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The language is, "That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to affect the routing instructions over and the traffic arrangements of such railroads as may not be taken under Federal control by the President," and so forth. I want to ask is there any other language but that which would affect those traffic arrangements? And, if it does not, does it not leave this language meaningless?

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, no; there is something in this act that might possibly lead to a different conclusion.

Mr. LENROOT. What?

Mr. DEWALT. There is a provision in the act itself to the effect that the President of his own initiative may route freight.

Mr. LENROOT. There is nothing about traffic arrangements.

Mr. DEWALT. Routing freight is traffic arrangements. I believe that provision is in the bill.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I want to give a practical illustration of a road which I know something about, it being a short-line road. A member of the Interstate Commerce Commission recommended that the Government should operate the road. The Secretary of the Treasury made the reply that "We have no money to operate small roads, and the President can deal with it as he deems wise." I therefore take it that the Government will not have anything to do with small roads. Am I correct in that?

Mr. DEWALT. I would not go quite as far as that, sir. I should think that the Government would have something to do with short-line railroads, and I appreciate very much the suggestion made by the gentleman from Missouri, Judge RUSSELL.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. But Mr. McAdoo said not.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. McAdoo illustrated it by saying:

We are calling into the draft service of the United States at this time those who are most efficient for service in the war. We want fighters, and we do not want cripples. Therefore I say to the railroads generally, "We want railroads that we can use, and we do not want railroads that we can not use."

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Then the small railroads must suffer?

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, no. That does not follow at all, because by the provisions of this bill I maintain, and they themselves maintain, that they are taken care of as far as possible.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. LAZARO. On day before yesterday the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] asked the chairman of the committee this question—it is short:

Mr. BURNETT. As I understand from your bill, you give this power to the President? That is, he may exercise it in regard to rates on railroads that are entirely inside of the border of a State, where the freight is entirely intrastate freight. Would not that absolutely, by this kind of legislation, destroy the power of the State railway commissions to fix intrastate rates on intrastate railroads, and so forth?

I would like to have the gentleman's opinion of that.

Mr. DEWALT. That raises a very important question. Some of these lines will not be taken over, and perhaps a number of them that are not small roads. So far as those roads are concerned that have to do with interstate commerce, they will certainly be governed by the Interstate Commerce Commission itself. You grant me that, do you not?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. The roads that are engaged entirely in intrastate business will, of course, be covered by the State commissions. But permit me to say that upon investigation it has been determined, at least it was so affirmed before the committee, that there were only three or four railroads in the United States that are exclusively devoted to intrastate traffic, and the reason for that is this: That if there be a car upon a road that carries any freight from Ohio to Pennsylvania or from one State through another, it is interstate traffic, and therefore if it gets on that line, it is interstate traffic.

I beg your pardon, gentlemen, for taking up so much time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] now use some time?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I come to the consideration of this question with a good deal of misgiving, owing to the importance of it and the complexity of the problem presented.

The committee, after five weeks of hearings and arguments, reports out this bill for consideration. It meets with the general approval of the committee, with possibly two or three major exceptions. No doubt some of the sections of the bill to which no attention has been directed in general debate ought to be amended in order to more clearly express the purpose of the bill and to make it more workable and more effective.

I am one of those who believe that we should have taken over control of the carriers even sooner than we did. As was stated by the gentleman [Mr. DEWALT] who just preceded me so clearly and so logically, the President took control over the roads under the act of August 29, 1916. That act was purely a war measure and gave to the President war powers. Of course, from the day of its enactment the President might have taken over the roads; but we were not at war and there was really no necessity for the President to take them over until we ourselves became involved in the struggle.

Even at that time, on the 6th of April, there were many notes of warning that the administration might well have heeded, and that would have justified the taking over of the roads. The carriers themselves realized the necessity of prompt and united action, for on the 11th day of April, five days after war was declared, their chief executives met and passed a resolution, declaring, among other things, that "during the present war they would coordinate their operations in a continental railway system, to produce a maximum of national transportation efficiency."

A committee was appointed to carry out the object of the resolution, but effective powers were not given to it. It did not create that continental system that the needs of the country required and that the war-traffic conditions made necessary. It did much, and I here willingly grant them all meed of praise for what they did accomplish in inducing shippers to load and unload their freight speedily, in inducing them to increase the car loading, and in adopting plans and policies which resulted in expediting traffic. But there was still no real continental system of control, no directing of all energies to one common purpose—the winning of the war. No committee with full powers to pool equipments was appointed until November 24, last, more than seven months after war began.

On the 17th day of November Mr. Anderson, one of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners, was requested to consider the framing of a bill for the taking over of the roads. Doubtless information of such proposed action may have come to the railroad executives. They met on the 24th, a week later, created a committee of vice presidents, sent them to Pittsburgh, and gave them, so far as they could do it, full powers of pooling equipments for the handling of all freight east of Chicago. This indicates to my mind that the railroad executives had begun to realize that there were still greater burdens for them to carry, and that greater sacrifices of the individual interests of their respective roads must be made, to the end that through complete unification and cooperation Government possession and control alone might be averted.

One week after this committee met at Pittsburgh, on the 1st day of December, the Interstate Commerce Commission sent to Congress its special report, in which two alternatives were presented: First, that there might be a repeal of all prohibitory statutes, such as section 6 of the interstate commerce act prohibiting pooling and the antitrust acts against combinations; or, second, that the Government should take control and possession of the roads under the act of August 29, 1916. On the 28th of December the President, adopting the alternative of Government control and possession, issued his proclamation taking over the roads. When this proclamation was issued a duty devolved upon Congress immediately to provide compensation for the roads taken over. As Judge DEWALT, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, has already explained, the act of 1916 contained no provision for compensation, and the Government under the Constitution could not take over this or any other property without just compensation. This bill makes provision for compensation for the carriers that are taken over. Section 1 of the bill relates entirely to the amount of the compensation and the plan by which it is to be ascertained. Before our committee several plans of compensation were presented by various witnesses. One plan suggested was that compensation should be based upon the value of the roads as disclosed by the market prices obtained for their stocks. The committee did not consider that the market value of the stocks of the carriers was a stable or just standard of the value of the properties, because stocks were subject to fluctuations, largely because of speculation therein, and that increases in market values of stocks did not reflect always increases in the property valuation.

Mr. Kruttschnitt, of the Southern Pacific, cited this instance in demonstration of the truth of the statement I have just made, that 10 years ago the stock of the Southern Pacific sold at 130, while on the day on which he testified it sold for 75, and that, too, notwithstanding the fact that during that 10-year period the road had put into its property $400,000,000, so that its property or investment value had increased 50 per cent in the 10 years, while its stock had depreciated 42 per cent. The committee did not believe the market value of stocks to be a fair or just basis for the fixing of compensation under this bill.

Another plan was suggested by Mr. Plumb, the representative of the railroad brotherhoods. Under it the carriers were to receive the standard return as provided in the bill, but that the Interstate Commerce Commission should proceed, as soon as possible, to ascertain the true value of the railroads of the United States, and that when determined the compensation should be fixed at a certain percentage of the valuation so found. The objection made to this plan of compensation lies in the fact that the physical valuation of railroad properties can not be completed until 1921. Judge Prouty, the director of valuation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, appeared before us and so stated. That being the case, the final valuation upon which the percentage was to be based would be deferred for a period of three years, and the war may be ended by that time.

Another basis of compensation was presented by myself, through an amendment offered in the committee. The amendment is as follows:

Provided, however, That the standard return to any such carrier whose average rate of net income to capital stock for the years aforesaid has been more than 5 per cent shall not exceed the net railway operating income for the year 1917, after deducting therefrom the amount available out of earnings for investment and surplus: Provided, however, That this further limitation shall not reduce the net income (above all operating expenses, taxes, interest, and all other fixed charges) of any such carrier below what is required to meet the regular didivend accruals on all capital stock outstanding December 31, 1917. The surplus over and above the aforesaid standard return shall be divided as follows: One-half shall go to the company earning such surplus, and the balance shall be paid into the revolving fund created by this act. All of said surplus and all property constructed out of or purchased by the same shall belong to, and shall be held in trust for, the public, and no return to any railway company or its assigns shall ever be paid thereon.

In my opinion there is nothing in this bill that will be a sufficient incentive for the carrier to promote the highest output in transportation. The carrier under the general guarantee herein provided does not care whether his road carries 10 or 15 per cent more traffic this year than it did in the years when it was under private management, because it is assured its standard return, based on the operations for the three preceding years. Its officials might say, "Why, the less traffic our road handles, the less wear and tear there will be upon its rolling stock and tracks." If we can give to the carrier a portion of the surplus, we will give the prod to efficiency. One fear I have as to the bill as we now have it is that there will not be that incentive to efficiency which is so necessary for the successful operation of the roads in war time.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. ESCH. No; go ahead.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman has called attention to the fact that the market value of the stock of the Southern Pacific had dropped from 130 to 75, notwithstanding the fact that they had invested $400,000,000 in the road. But did he say anything about the amount of stock and bonds that had been issued in the meantime?

Mr. ESCH. No; he made no statement of that kind.

Mr. GORDON. Would not that be a material factor affecting the price of the stock per share?

Mr. ESCH. As I recollect, the Southern Pacific reorganization occurred some years ago and there has been very little addition to the capital stock. So the purpose for which he cited the figures would be pertinent.

Mr. GORDON. If there had been an abnormal issue of stock, did the committee obtain information as to the extent of the increase of stock when there has been no extension of the line?

Mr. ESCH. There are tables printed in the hearings giving capitalization year by year for the last 10 or 15 years.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Did he state the earnings during these corresponding years?

Mr. ESCH. The earnings increased, but the expenditures increased at a more rapid rate. I may say that that has been the experience of many roads.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman used the term in explaining his proposed guaranty "regular dividends" of the road. What does the gentleman mean by "regular dividends"? Over what period would he continue them?

Mr. ESCH. Over the period of three years, the same we are using in the bill itself.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Would not that mean the same as the bill provides for?

Mr. ESCH. Yes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who preceded me, gave the result in dollars and cents of the operation of the bill by applying to carriers the standard return therein provided. It is not my purpose to duplicate the figures that he gave. I make the average for the three years on the roads of class 1, $896,000,000, in round numbers. If we add the operating income for class 2 and 3 roads, we will make a total of $935,000,000.

The bill, as you will notice, provides that in addition to the standard return for the three years prior to June 30, 1917, there should be added a percentage—the rate to be determined by the President—on the cost of additions, betterments, and road extensions made during the six months ending December 31 last. That cost was $130,000,000, and 5 per cent thereon would amount to six and a half million dollars, which, added to the $935,000,000, would make a maximum guaranty of $941,500,000 for which the Government would be obligated.

Out of this sum the carriers must pay their excess-profits tax, estimated all the way from $50,000,000 to $60,000,000. Even with this deducted there would still be about $900,000,000 which the Government would have to stand for in carrying out section 1 of this bill, to apply on interest and dividends. There are $10,000,000,000 of bonded indebtedness of the carriers of the United States. That represents about $450,000,000 of interest that, deducted from the $900,000,000 of the guaranty, would leave about $450,000,000 for dividend purposes. Four hundred and fifty million dollars on the capitalization of the roads as of last year—$7,000,000,000—would represent something like 7 per cent. If we take the whole capitalization of stocks and bonds, then this guaranty would represent on the capitalization about 5.63 per cent and upon the book value only 5.19 per cent.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. HARDY. In ascertaining that percentage of income on the stocks and bonds, did not the gentleman omit from the esti mate the fact that these bonds had been allowed $450,000,000 on the income?

Mr. ESCH. Oh, yes. The amount of the return provided by this bill applied to the total capitalization would represent 5.63 per cent.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SWITZER. The gentleman does not mean that that is actually paid out?

Mr. ESCH. No; dividends may be earned but not always declared. A large share of the surplus may be used for dividends or be used for additions, betterments, or road extensions.

Mr. SWITZER. Does the gentleman know what part of this is for that purpose?

Mr ESCH. No; I can not state.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. SNOOK. The gentleman has made a statement about the value of stocks and bonds of these roads, and also the value of the capital. I believe he stated that the capital issued was about $7,000,000,000. He would not say that that came anywhere near, in his opinion, representing the value of the money invested in the roads?

Mr. ESCH. Not at all; and I did not so state.

Mr. SNOOK. I call my colleague's attention to that because a speech made by some gentleman here left the impression that this standard return provided for in section 1 of the bill would yield an income on the money invested of over 8 per cent to the railroads. That would not be so, would it?

Mr. ESCH. It depends on how you figure that.

Mr. SNOOK. If the value of the roads is anything like what it is believed to be.

Mr. ESCH. If you take the total valuation, it could not be 8 per cent.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman stated a moment ago that the Government would have to stand for $900,000,000 guaranty. Of course, it is contemplated that under the Government management the roads will earn at least as much as they earned heretofore; and if they do, the Government will not have to stand for anything, will it? The roads will earn the money and ought to be entitled to the same compensation that they have had heretofore.

Mr. ESCH. By "standing for it" I meant that that was the guaranty. The roads are doing the business as they have heretofore, and the amount of money they take in is being disbursed currently, as if there had been no Federal control.

Mr. SNYDER. If they do earn the same as they earned heretofore——

Mr. ESCH. The Government will not be out, but I have not such confidence that that will be the result. I am very fearful that under Government control there will be an increase of wages, and in fact the wage board is now considering that very question. There will be an increase in the cost of materials, and when you add those increases of cost I expect to see the Government's liability increase. On the other hand, economies are prophesied under Federal control, because competition will be eliminated.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. May it not also be said that there will be an increase in rates to compensate for these things the gentleman is speaking about?

Mr. ESCH. If the bill remains as it is now written, with the power claimed by the Director General to make and initiate rates, I feel confident that there will be increases of rates, and the trouble with that provision of the bill making the Government a guarantor of the standard return is that the Government would be induced to increase the rates to lessen its liability under its guaranty.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Is there any available information as to the number of stockholders and the character of their holdings?

Mr. ESCH. Some information was given as to that, and, as I recollect the figures, there are about 600,000 stockholders in the United States.

Mr. LONDON. How is the stock distributed among them?

Mr. ESCH. The holdings, on the average, are very small.

Mr. SIMS. Dividing the whole volume by the whole number of stockholders the average holding is thirteen thousand and odd dollars.

Mr. ESCH. That would imply that there are some holders that have very large blocks of stock, if the average is $13,000.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. The gentleman made a statement that he thought it would be an inducement for the Government to raise the rate for the purpose of——

Mr. ESCH. Lessening its liability under the guaranty.

Mr. AYRES. Is it not a fact that the railroads for months and months have been carrying on a propaganda creating a sentiment also to have the rates raised many hundreds of thousands of dollars?

Mr. ESCH. Not only a propaganda, but actual cases before the commission, known as the 15 per cent advance rate cases, which were heard last March and April, and as to which a finding was made in June allowing a 5 per cent increase on certain traffic in eastern classification territory and allowing an increase of 15 per cent on coke, coal, and iron, and those hearings were reopened last October because of the changed condition of the financial returns on the part of the carriers, but the commission made no final determination as to the hearings had in October.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true that since the war the earnings of the railroads have been abnormally high, due to the increased business and the traffic?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; I think that can be very safely stated.

Mr. PLATT. President Hadley, of Yale, I think, in his book on railroad transportation, says practically that the railroad corporation is a corporation of the small investor. Would the gentleman say that that is practically true?

Mr. ESCH. No; I think not. Only a few men and a few powerful financial institutions, mainly banks and trust companies, have the destinies of the railroads of the United States in their hands.

Mr. PLATT. But when these men die we usually find that they have only a very few shares and that they have their control through proxies.

Mr. ESCH. That is the trouble with the railroad situation to-day, that they are controlled by men who are directors and, in many instances, have holdings of only from one to five shares of stock, sufficient to qualify as directors; and it is one of the weak spots in the management of the carriers that they are controlled by men who have not a direct and a very vital financial interest in the property that they are trying to carry on.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I say to the gentleman that recent statistics published by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. show that they have over 100,000 stockholders?

Mr. ESCH. Yes. Does the gentleman know the average amount of the holdings?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not; but the point is made of the fact that those 100,000 stockholders are made up largely of women.

Mr. ESCH. There was a statement made before our committee to the effect that so many women and children held these railroad securities——

Mr. GORDON. And orphans.

Mr. ESCH. And orphans, that there ought to be special consideration given to them, and that safeguards should be thrown around their holdings. Mr. Plumb presented, however, a table showing the proportion of total stock held by 10 leading stockholders in principal railway systems in 1915. The table is as follows:

[1] In hands of receiver.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question about the matter of rates. He suggested that the Government would possibly raise the rates. I notice that the bill provides that the Government shall initiate rates only on roads controlled by it?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Interstate Commerce Commission, as I understand it, will retain jurisdiction of the uncontrolled roads. Is that the idea?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the Government relinquishes control of a large number of the roads on which the Government has raised the rate, and fixes a rate on the controlled roads different from that obtaining on the uncontrolled roads, how are we going to coordinate? How is the shipper going to know, if we have two sets of rates on two different roads? When a man wants to ship on two different roads, with that condition, how will he be controlled in making his through rates?

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman can settle that situation if he will vote for amendments to be offered upon our side leaving the initiative of rates where the initiative now is.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman a few moments ago referred to the act of 1916 giving the Government a right to control the railroads. Under the word "control," as contained in the act of 1916, does the gentleman think the power to establish rates is given to the President?

Mr. ESCH. I do not. I think it raises a very grave constitutional question, and in connection with that I wish to read what Senator THOMAS said last week in the Senate in regard to this very paragraph of the act of August 29, 1916, under which the President took over the roads. Senator THOMAS is the author of that paragraph of the act of 1916. Here is what he said:

> I had no intention of making it so operate as to invest the President with anything more than the power to control the possession of the physical property of the railroads for war purposes.

Indicating that in his mind there was to be no power given over the rate problem. That power was to be left where it now is. The power he intended to confer was only as to the physical control over the property for war emergency.

Mr. STEELE. I think the gentleman will agree that the question is not what was in the Senator's mind at the time, but what is the proper conclusion of the language as used.

Mr. ESCH. And judging from the Senator's interpretation of his own language he, I, and the gentleman agree.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. For just one more question. If the railroads have all the business they can do and all the traffic they can carry and are earning more now than they have heretofore and are not paying their dividends or making expenses, how do they expect in the future to pay this increased rate or pay the indebtedness that the Government will be put to in taking over the railroads?

Mr. GORDON. They do not expect to pay it; they expect the Government to pay it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That might be true before this abnormal condition came about by which they have been doing more business than they can transact, and still they can not pay the rate.

Mr. ESCH. That condition of a surplus of business is not widespread over all the railroads of the country. There are some railroads that could do vastly more business than they are doing, but the congestion is where they are all trying to run through the neck of the bottle.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am obliged to the gentleman for speaking about that congestion at the neck of the bottle. I have heard it stated that in the shipment of coal they could not get through the cities of Pittsburgh, Detroit, Chicago, and other places because of the congestion of coal on cars which they could not move at those places, while the people at those places were freezing for the need of coal, right there in those cities.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman state what caused that congestion?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They say it was a congestion; why could not they take those cars——

Mr. AYRES. Was not the railroad company using those cars for storage for railroad purposes in many instances?

Mr. ESCH. Gentlemen, I have got to discuss two points to this bill. One relates to section 11, covering the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to rates, and the other to section 14, relating to the term of control. I am firmly convinced that we will make a mistake if we leave section 11 with relation to the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission as now written. I believe we should not change the existing law with reference to the commission. I certainly object to giving to the President the right to initiate rates, even though it be coupled with the right of making complaints before the commission, the commission to pass upon the justness or reasonableness of such rates, where the veto still remains in the President, notwithstanding the recommendation of the commission.

Where the President initiates a rate we are revolutionizing rate making as it now exists. Under the existing law the carrier files a schedule for increases with the commission, and before it is approved the commission must investigate on its own motion or upon complaint before it can be filed. The right to suspend the rate remains, but when you give to the President the right to initiate the rates they become effective at once, without opportunity for consideration or examination by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Suppose the President should initiate the rate. Suppose complaint was made and the commission found the rate to be unjust and unreasonable, and the President agreed with the commission's recommendation. There will be hundreds of people, possibly, who paid the rate that had been initiated by the President and which was found by the commission thereafter to be unjust or unreasonable. That would give rise to a vast number of claims for operation. Those shippers who paid that rate would feel that they were entitled to reimbursement, and yet, knowing that the President had initiated the rate, knowing the delays in securing reparation, they would forego their action for reparation and would suffer the loss. I do not believe, gentlemen, there should be given to one man this tremendous power. The gross earnings or the total business of the carriers of this country amount to about $4,000,000,000 in a single year. To give to an individual the power to determine rates over such a tremendous traffic as that is a power no nation that claims to be a democracy should grant. Why, no nation that is at war to-day has given to any individual in it the power to make rates.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Have not we pledged in our declaration of war all our resources to the successful prosecution of the war to the President himself? Now, the gentleman is not willing to trust what he calls a tremendous power simply to initiate a rate and maintain it if he thinks it is necessary in order that the President may do that which we have authorized him to do.

Mr. ESCH. If the gentleman's contention is correct, then we should give to the President in a war emergency the power to raise money, the power to fix our customs duties, the power to fix our internal-revenue taxation, the power to fix postal rates.

There is no one here that would have the hardihood to claim that we should abrogate our functions and give to the Chief Executive such tremendous power. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Another question in that connection. Do you not believe if it was necessary to win this war to give him the power to levy taxes and revenues, you would do it without hesitating?

Mr. GORDON. If you would, you would violate your oath of office. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. PLATT. I was going to ask the gentleman if he thought the power to fix the price of transportation was any greater power than the power to fix the price of food as we did. It is not as great and no more taxation, either.

Mr. DOREMUS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. DOREMUS. I was going to ask my colleague of the committee if he does not make a distinction between clothing the Executive with power to fix taxes at the customhouse and clothing him with power to fix the rates upon the railroads? In other words, would not one be a clearly unconstitutional exercise of power while the other would be within the Constitution?

Mr. ESCH. Whether constitutional or not, I do not think it would be wise to give any one man the power of fixing the rates on the traffic of the United States, for the fixing of rates is a species of taxation, and no single individual should be given that power.

Mr. DOREMUS. Does my friend question the constitutional power of Congress to delegate to the President the power to fix transportation rates?

Mr. ESCH. I think we could delegate the power. I am protesting against the unwisdom of the delegation of such power and have tried to show in the argument I have thus far presented that it might result in loss and damage to the shipping interests of the country. I do not know whether we realize what a sensitive structure the rate structure of the United States is. The change of a single cent per hundredweight may change terminal markets and bring loss to numerous industries. To give this power to a single individual, without investigation, to fix the rates, seems to me to invite disaster. We ought not to do it, because it is not necessary, gentlemen, in the successful conduct of the war to turn over the rate-making power to the Chief Executive.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman clear up one point that has been troubling me? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] stated very likely the President would increase the wages of those employed by the railroads to the extent of 20 per cent. If the President has the power to do that, which would be a charge against the railroads, how does the gentleman explain opposition to the suggestion that if the President should fix rates, which would be a charge perhaps in favor of the railroads, he should increase the wages?

Mr. ESCH. I suppose there will be increases of wages. I can not talk advisedly on that matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to suggest that when under private ownership the railroads had the power of increasing rates, but the rates had to be passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. PLATT. Was not that just what was the matter?

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. PLATT. It was, exactly.

Mr. ESCH. I can not yield further, as I have only 10 more minutes.

Another question was suggested by a gentleman on my right, and that is the infinite confusion that we will get into, if we give the President the right of initiating rates, arising out of the fact that there will be a large number of lines that will not be taken over. That is conceded now. There are some 800 short lines with a total capitalization of something like $1,200,000,000. Many of these will not be taken over. There may be some large lines that will not be taken over. Then, besides that, the bill provides that the President can relinquish control over lines prior to the 1st of July next.

And there is another provision in the last section under which the President can relinquish control over any lines after he has made an agreement to this effect with such carrier. What does it all mean? It means that thousands of miles of railroad in the United States will not be under the control of the Government, and if not taken over by the Government, they can not be under the control of the Director General. Where do they go? Under whose authority are they? Who shall make the rates? Why, the Interstate Commerce Commission. Then, you will have thousands of miles of railroad in the United States that are under the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has the power to fix the rates thereon. You will have other thousands of miles of road under the Director General, and he will have the power to fix the rates, according to the contention of this bill. That, gentlemen, will bring inextricable confusion into the rate-making structure of the United States, and we do not want to invite that. No one of us wishes that, but it is inevitable if the bill remains as it is.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Have you not always had such a conflict of authority between the State commissions and the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. ESCH. Oh, but not nearly the difficulty that there would be under this new arrangement.

Mr. DEMPSEY. It exists in as many jurisdictions as there are States, does it not?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; but under the Shreveport decision those differences between the Federal Government and the States are being rapidly overcome and not added to.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman excuse me just one further question? The confusion which I referred to awhile ago could be obviated, could it not, by striking out lines 14 and 15 on page 12, as to Federal control, so that if the President initiated rates at all it would be for all roads, and not only for those under his control? Would not that obviate the confusion? Whether it would obviate the objection or not I am not prepared to say.

Mr. ESCH. As an illustration of sudden action on the part of the individual, I wish to cite the instance of a special order of the Director General, made early in January, changing the rules as to demurrage practically overnight, and the commission merely passing on it pro forma.

By that single order the Director General, without hearing, without notice, increased the demurrage rates throughout the United States to a maximum of $10 per day. He also abolished the average agreement and the bunching rules, to which rules the commerce and manufacturing industry of the United States had adapted itself. He did it overnight. The traffic people were not here, and did not have an opportunity to be heard.

As soon as the order became effective the traffic and industrial people of the United States brought to the attention of the Director General the injustice of his order and the hardship it was creating, and the Director General, after that rule had been in force and effect only nine days, changed it back virtually to what it was before. There ought to be a careful, calm consideration of these schedules and of these rates.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. ESCH. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. Was not the change back to the former rate probably induced by the fact that this higher demurrage rate had apparently, at least, accomplished its purpose in securing the unloading of the cars?

Mr. ESCH. No; that is not the reason why it was modified.

Mr. SIMS. It did not reduce the rate under the modification.

Mr. ESCH. The maximum was $10 a day.

Mr. SIMS. That did not exist before he made his order.

Mr. ESCH. It began at $3, according to my recollection.

Now, gentlemen, I have used my hour, and I want to close with a reference to the fourteenth section, concerning the last contention, namely, as to the time limit. I have not time to read more than this recommendation which I make with reference to it.

We believe that a period of one year or less after the proclamation of peace will be a sufficient period for the continuance of Federal control. The length of time which will elapse between an armistice and the ratification of the treaty of peace is certain to be many months. This time, added to the one-year limitation, would, in our opinion, be sufficient for Congress to pass whatever legislation might be necessary for the adjustment of the financial relations between the Government and the carriers and the enactment of whatever other legislation may be necessary. The Congress that will then be in existence will be as patriotic as this Congress and can be trusted to enact the necessary legislation. As the carriers were taken over under the war power, the tenure should be no longer than the duration of the war and a reasonable time thereafter. This Congress, fixing as it does in the pending bill the terms of agreement for just compensation, should at the same time fix the term.

In conclusion, we do not wish by this bill to hinder or embarrass the President in the slightest degree so far as operation of the carriers is concerned. We grant him fullest power in all matters of operation, in all matters of directing traffic, of rerouting shipments and preventing cross hauling and long hauling, or even in the imposition of demurrage rates. As to all matters of transportation, give him a free hand; but when it comes to the matter of rates, preserve the power over rate making in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for one hour.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I had intended to cover during my remarks three phases of this bill as those occurring to me to be the most important, and perhaps those which will be controverted more keenly than others by various members of the committee and of the House. I had intended to discuss first the compensation feature of the bill, and then the rate-regulating power, which has been discussed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], and then I desired also to discuss the question of the time limit or the tenure of Government control as provided in the bill and as advocated by some Members who do not entirely agree with that provision as it appears in the bill.

I think we ought, in the consideration of the compensation section of the bill, to keep in mind the fact that Congress can not fix the compensation which the Government must pay the railroads for their use during the period of Government control.

During the Civil War, when the Government took over under a law passed by Congress 2,105 miles of railroad mileage in the United States, Congress had attempted in the chartering of many of these railroads to limit the charges which the Government should pay upon those particular roads for the transportation of Government property, troops, and supplies, because of the fact that those were land-grant roads which had been allowed to use certain public lands of the United States. In the provision of the law it was attempted to be enacted that in the transportation of troops and military supplies these land-grant railroads should not be permitted to charge the Government of the United States for that service.

Notwithstanding that provision of the law and that provision in the original charters of their roads, the War Department during the Civil War undertook to construe that language to mean that while the Government might have the right to the use of the road itself, it did not give any right to the Government to use the rolling stock or the equipment of the road free of charge, and there was an appropriation made by Congress to take care of the charges that had been agreed to between the War Department and these land-grant railroads. The Supreme Court later, in the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe case, I believe, in the Ninety-third United States, decided that the War Department was within its jurisdiction in holding that while the Government of the United States might have the right to use the roadway, it did not have the right under the charter to expect the railroads to haul its troops and supplies without due compensation.

Now, in this bill we are not attempting to fix the compensation of the roads, because Congress has no power to fix the compensation. Under the Constitution, as has already been explained forcibly and lucidly by other gentlemen, the Government had the right to take the property. There may be some dispute in this argument as to whether, except by the act of August 29, 1916, the President would have had the right to take over the railroads under the elastic war power conferred upon him by direct and implied provisions of the Constitution. But laying that all aside, the President, acting under the power as conferred upon him by the act of 1916, took over the railroads in the absence of any congressional provision in regard to just compensation therefor. We are here attempting to provide a method of fixing that by agreement.

Now, Congress can not by any enactment fix the compensation. Congress can not by any enactment compel the railroads to accept any suggestion that it makes with reference to compensation. We can not take away from those railroads their legal right to go into court and submit legal evidence on the question of ample compensation, as intended by the Constitution. All that we are attempting to do here is to suggest a basis for a contract between the roads and the Government which will obviate the necessity of litigating that question in the courts of the United States.

Of course, we have provided that the President shall be authorized to make a contract. But we can not compel the roads to accept the contract which he will offer. He can not compel that any more than he can compel these railroads to accept any suggestion that he may make with reference to just compensation to which they may be entitled.

Therefore in determining how far the President may go in making this contract we have fixed the maximum as the standard return arrived at by an average of the three years ending June 30, 1917.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman answer a question there that is bothering me a little?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will permit the gentleman to ask it, and I will answer it if I can.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is the President authorized to make any other contract than that provided in this bill, if the compensation does not exceed that which is provided in the bill? You say you prescribe the maximum.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is he authorized to go below that?

Mr. BARKLEY. He is authorized to go as far below the standard return as he can in making any contract that the railroad companies will sign. In all probability they will not be willing to sign any contract that goes very much below the standard return, but we know he can not go above the standard return.

There were witnesses before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce who advocated that we ought to go back for six years and take an average for six years in order to arrive at the standard return above which the President should not be authorized to go. In looking at the result that would have come about if that suggestion had been accepted we found ourselves confronted with a situation where we would have been compelled to fix a standard return which would have been based upon a capitalization or upon an amount of money invested very much below that amount which is now invested in the railroads throughout the United States. The carriers would probably not have accepted such terms, and the whole situation would have been thrown into the courts, with all the possibility of delay and uncertainty and consequently financial chaos.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Why did you fix three years instead of one year; that is, 1915, 1916, and 1917 instead of the year 1917?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will state to the gentleman that the railroad companies desired that that should be done. Those who represent the railroad companies insisted that we ought to follow the policy that was followed by England in fixing the period next prior to the taking over of the roads in fixing their compensation. It so happens that in England the year 1913 was the high-water mark of net income and earnings of the British railroads. When the war broke out, on the 4th day of August, 1914, of course they had not completed their yearly period of accounting. The war between England and Germany came about on the afternoon, I believe, of the 4th of August. At 12 o'clock that night all the railroads in Great Britain were taken over by the Government by an order in council issued almost immediately upon the declaration of war.

Within a very few hours after England and Germany had locked horns in war England took over her railroads. They were taken over without any agreement about compensation. They were taken over under an old act of 1871, which permitted the Queen, by an order in council—and, of course, the King if it happened to be a King—to take over the railroads in Great Britain, not only in time of war, but at any time whenever it should be determined to be in the public interest. They had the right to take over the railroads, but they could only take them for one week at a time, and so from the 5th day of August, at one minute after midnight, 1914, until now they have renewed that order from week to week in England, in order to preserve and keep control of the railroads, because the law itself only allows them to take over the railroads for one week at a time.

It so happened that the year 1913 in England was the high-water mark of railroad earning capacity and the British Secretary of State under the English law made a contract with the railroads that they should be compensated upon the basis of the net income for 1913, which was the year previous to the outbreak of the war. There was subsequently an arrangement whereby, if the first seven months of 1914 were to exceed or to fall below the corresponding period of 1913, there was to be a readjustment of compensation in accordance with those results; but on the 1st day of January, 1915, that agreement was withdrawn, and now for all practical purposes we may say that England will compensate and guarantee her railroads upon the basis of the net earnings for 1913. I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] that in view of the fact that 1916 was an abnormally prosperous year for the railroads in the United States, while for the year 1917 the net earnings had fallen off a little, the fiscal year of the railroads being the calendar year, instead of the year ending June 30, as formerly, we did not believe we should take one year alone. But in view of the fact that the war had been in progress during 1915, 1916, and 1917, and by a sort of reflex action upon industries and the financial system of the United States due to the world war, there had been some abnormal conditions on both sides, we thought an average of the year 1915, which was a very low year in railroad prosperity, and of 1916 and 1917, both of which were prosperous years, would be about as fair an average as we could arrive at in order to authorize the President to make a contract with those roads for that sum, if he should see fit, or for lower than that if he could persuade them to enter into a contract to that effect.

Now, the object of our committee has been, and the object of Congress ought to be, and no doubt will be, to provide in this law a contract that the railroad companies will be likely to sign, because if we should fix the maximum compensation so low that the railroads would not enter into it, and would fall back upon their legal right to go into court and have their rights adjudicated according to the rules of evidence and according to their earning capacity, which would be the test of their right to compensation, then we would tie up in the courts of law more than $18,000,000,000 worth of stocks and bonds, and what has been estimated at nearly one-seventh of the entire property of the United States, and this would so undermine the credit and the financial structure of our country that we might precipitate a panic in the midst of war.

Because no man who has not given the question serious study can estimate the great influence the railroad securities of the country have on the structure and fabric of national credit, and anything that would undermine the securities and the stocks of railroads, anything that would unsettle the market with reference to railroad securities, would unsettle the market with reference to all securities, and might place the country in a serious and embarrassing situation. We felt that was about the best average, the most reasonable that could be arrived at—one lean year and two prosperous years.

Therefore, not having the power to compel the railroads to accept any compensation which Congress might fix, we have attempted to arrive at a reasonable sum as a basis upon the railroads and the Government might enter into voluntary agreement.

I would very much hate to imagine the disastrous results that would come to the country in this precarious posture in our financial and domestic affairs, if all or any considerable number of railroads in this country felt themselves justified in going into court and establishing the amount of money that the Government should pay them for the use of their roads. It is impossible to imagine the disastrous results that might come not only to the prosecution of the war itself but to all forms of credit or investment in our country during this period.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not a fact that under this system a number of railroads will receive from 15 to 25 per cent on the par value of their capital stock?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is possible that some roads may receive more than 12 per cent upon the par value of their stock. I doubt very seriously if any will go as high as 25 per cent. But these roads have been making that net income on the par value of their stock before the Government took them over, and it would be competent evidence in any court of justice in the United States to show that that was their earning capacity, and the Government could not afford to put itself in the position of taking forcibly, without their consent, private property for public use and expect them to be limited to any particular percentage on the par value, because Congress might decide that it was too much, especially where they had the approval and sanction of the Interstate Commerce Commission which has the power to pass upon the reasonableness of their rates.

Mr. DOWELL. But suppose the rate fixed in the bill is both unreasonable and not a just rate, would the gentleman be in favor of paying what he believed to be more than what was reasonable and just after they are taken over by the Government?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think we may assume that the Interstate Commerce Commission has, in the main, performed its duty satisfactorily. The gentleman must not confuse a reasonable rate for hauling a particular consignment of freight with a reasonable return on the investment of the company. The Interstate Commerce Commission has the right to fix the reasonableness of any rate that the company may charge the public for service it renders, but they are not given by law any power to pass upon the reasonableness of dividends that may be declared by reason of the efficient and economical management by the company to which the stockholders may be entitled.

I do not know of any criterion where Congress could set itself up as the dictator of what should be a reasonable compensation as a reward for economic and intelligent management of these roads.

Mr. DOWELL. If the gentleman will permit, is it not true that when the Government takes over the railroads they are in a different position? The Government should pay to the railroad what is a reasonable rate. I think we all concede that. It ought not to pay more than is reasonable and just. Is not that correct?

Mr. BARKLEY. Theoretically the gentleman may be correct, but legally he is in error. The Government is compelled to pay the railroad companies what they would be reasonably expected to recover if they went into a court and litigated what they were entitled to.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman believe that the roads should receive more than is just and fair or that they would recover more than what would be just and reasonable in a court of justice?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a speculative question that nobody could answer, because nobody in advance can say what the court might hold as reasonable and just, but the court legally would be compelled to fix the verdict on the earning capacity of the road demonstrated by experience in the past.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. RAYBURN. Is it not also true that the capital stock of any road has little to do with the actual value of the road?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true, or with the earning capacity.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is it not a fact that during the years adopted, and for many years previous, the railroads, while they may on the basis on which the figures are made up have yielded a gross income of 12 per cent or over, have only paid a moderate dividend of 5, 6, or 7 per cent, and have used the rest of the gross earnings to keep up their rolling stock, roadbeds, and terminals, and by that policy have kept them up so as to handle efficiently the business which it was necessary for them to handle for the benefit of the country?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true with respect to many roads. As has been suggested, the expense of the equipment of the railroads has within the last three years advanced nearly 100 per cent. The railroads must bear that expense, and because of the increase of expenses of equipment some have not been able to keep up to the standard that I believe ought to be set for railroads in the public service. Some of them, because of their effort to do so, have been denied the privilege of declaring dividends on their stock as a reward for the investments of the stockholders.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again? I do not want to interrupt unless it is agreeable.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not a fact that under this bill the Government itself takes care of all the expenses, the upkeep of the road, and has to keep it in as good condition as it was before the war?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; but that must come out of the earnings of the railroads, and it is charged as a part of operating expenses, just like it has been heretofore.

Mr. DOWELL. Is not the amount I have referred to the net, after paying all of these expenses?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not necessarily; but even if it were, in some isolated cases, that would not justify the Government in saying to a railroad which has been charging rates by the consent and sanction of the Government itself that because by wise and economic management it has been able to make a greater per cent on its investment than some other roads, that it is going to take that away from it and put it in the Treasury of the United States. That certainly would not be the criterion which we would set up for ourselves in passing on any other private property that the Government might feel it necessary to take over.

My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], suggested that he had offered an amendment providing that where railroads had earned above a certain per cent—I think the amendment mentioned 5 per cent—during the period of the standard return, the three years ending June 30, 1917—that if they had earned more than 5 per cent on their investment the Government should in those cases guarantee interest upon their indebtedness, guarantee their regular dividend, and then divide all that was over and above that 5 per cent between the railroad company and the Government, in order to induce the railroad company to go on and be patriotic and act with efficiency and the same wisdom they had displayed heretofore. The amendment went further and provided that this one-half of the surplus should be used in paying roads that had not made up to that amount any deficit that might accrue to them in their operation during the period of Government control. In other words that amendment would penalize frugality and industry and wise control, and it would offer a reward for inefficiency. I can not imagine a more unjust provision for the compensation of railroads by the Government than to take away some of the money earned by the prosperous and well-managed roads and give it to some that had been managed and operated with little wisdom or efficiency. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to say to my colleague on the committee I believe that the road that made the highest percentage of net return for the last three years is the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad. I maintain that the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie is one of the best equipped and gives the best service; in fact, it has the name of being the best equipped and giving the best service of any railroad in the United States to-day. It would not be fair to take the earnings away from a railroad that is giving such service.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no. I think the gentleman is entirely correct. I desire to discuss for a few moments the question of the power to make rates, upon which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] has spoken so ably and yet, I think, so erroneously. The Interstate Commerce Commission has never enjoyed the power to initiate rates. The Interstate Commerce Commission of its own motion can not increase rates; it can not initiate rates; it has no initiative power with reference to rates except that whenever a railroad company fixes or files with it a schedule of rates, either upon complaint or upon its own initiative, the commission may investigate the reasonableness, the fairness, of the rates, and it may grant it or suspend it or entirely nullify it. But never has the Interstate Commerce Commission been given any right ab initio to bring about an increase or change in rates where the railroad companies themselves have not started the procedure.

Mr. DOWELL. But, under the system the gentleman has just referred to, the practical effect is to fix the rate by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BARKLEY. The practical effect is that if the rate satisfies the Interstate Commerce Commission they approve it, and if the rate does not they disapprove it. But that is not the question that I am coming to. When these railroads were taken over by the Government, it has been suggested that they lost all incentive to bring about an increase in revenue. That may be true, because their standard return is guaranteed to them. That being true, if the railroad companies themselves have no further interest in procuring a change of rates, and the Interstate Commerce Commission can not do so, then where shall we lodge the power to initiate increases or changes in rates that are to be charged on the roads? Not only does this section apply to rates but it applies to regulations and practices of all sorts that are prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and by the law. When the Government took over these railroads the President of the United States, under the law, stepped into the shoes of the managers and boards of directors and the presidents of all of the railroads in the United States. Therefore he succeeded by operation of law to the powers which they enjoyed prior to taking over the roads by the Government. That being true, then there is no other authority where the power to initiate ought to be lodged except in the hands of the man who succeeded in every way the management of these railroads while they were under private control. [Applause.] If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is correct, there can not be any change of rates while the Government controls the roads; and it has already been suggested, and we predict it with a certain degree of moral assurance, that the wages of the railroad men will be increased, and I think they ought to be increased. They may be increased as much as 20 or 25 per cent.

Now, if it becomes necessary to increase the wages of railroad men in order to do justice to them and keep them at work, satisfied and contented, and those increases should amount to $100,000,000 or $200,000,000, and it should be necessary for rates to be increased in order to make up the deficiency brought about by the increase in railroad wages, and the gentleman from Wisconsin succeeds in his amendment, who will have the power to bring about that increase? The railroads will not do it, because they are not any longer interested. They get their standard return, no matter what the revenues, no matter what the wages, no matter what the expenses may be. They have no further interest in it and it can not be presumed they will do it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Has an additional burden like that ever been placed upon the railroads of this country by the Interstate Commerce Commission that they have failed to respond to it?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think not.

Mr. GORDON. Why does the gentleman assume they will not do it now?

Mr. BARKLEY. Because nobody has the power. The Interstate Commerce Commission can not make any changes of its own motion. It can not say, "We have heard in a roundabout way that the President increased wages, and that will increase operating expenses, and in order to meet the deficit we must raise the rate." They can not do that; nobody proposes to give them power to do it, and they ought not to be given the power ab initio to start proceedings.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will call attention to the fact that the amendment I offered to the committee gave the President the power to initiate rates and put him in exactly the same position that the railroads are now and left the Interstate Commerce Commission exactly as it is now.

Mr. BARKLEY. And let the Interstate Commerce Commission come along and veto what the President has done and overrule him in the exercise of its power. If the President enjoys any power in the control of these roads it is either by virtue of the statute itself or by the implied war power of the Constitution. He has taken them over according to his proclamation in pursuance of the statute passed in August, 1916. Now, I do not believe the President of the United States——

Mr. RAYBURN. May I ask the gentleman this question? Everybody knows—I presume that they do—that the President will not upon his own knowledge, and without consulting anybody, fix these rates, and neither will the Director General. He is going to consult somebody. Where in America is there a better body to consult than the Interstate Commerce Commission? [Applause.] And where, further, is there a body in this Government that in its long standing has been subject to as little just criticism as the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree with every statement the gentleman from Texas makes, and I am perfectly willing for him to consult the Interstate Commerce Commission and the bill provide that the commission shall be consulted. If anybody objects to a rate that he makes, they can take it up and have a hearing, and then the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission are prima facie evidence of their own correctness, and there is not a President of any political party who would not be guided by the results of the investigation of the Interstate Commerce Commission in so far as possible in the public interest.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the framers of this bill had not been driven as a final thing to make——

Mr. BARKLEY. How is that?

Mr. RAYBURN. If the framers of this bill had not by sentiment in the committee and outside of it been driven in some way to bring in the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to these rates and somebody else had been in favor of the Interstate Commerce Commission and brought in this amendment, the gentleman who believes that the President should be charged with all of this authority would have said that this amendment was an insult to the President of the United States, for this reason——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yielded to the gentleman for a question. Go ahead and finish the question.

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, well, I have not asked the question yet.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman is a long time getting ready to ask one.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am not going to ask it.

Mr. BARKLEY. When the bill was first brought in those who believed with the gentleman from Texas, fearing that the President might have some authority to initiate a rate, brought in an amendment reserving specifically to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to initiate or to fix rates.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then it was that this provision was added to the bill in the committee, not because they were driven by anybody, but because they wanted to preserve the unity of control of these railroads while they are under Federal control. It is a ridiculous anomaly, if I may be permitted to suggest, that the President of the United States has the right to increase the wages of the employees of all those companies and yet can not increase the revenue. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. The railroads can not do it.

Mr. BARKLEY. They can do it, subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. But they have been superseded by the Government and no longer are interested about whether revenues are sufficient to meet expenses.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. DECKER. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that there is this vital difference between the private owners of railroads and the Director General of the United States, manager of railroads. The private owners of railroads are human beings, and look after their own interests first. The Director General of the United States is a public official, representing you and me and 110,000,000 people, and he looks out for both sides.

Mr. LENROOT. How about the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. DECKER. Who appoints the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman has stated undoubtedly the wages of railroad employees will be increased, and I agree with him. Who will do that, the President of the United States having control, and if so, would not the President recommend increases of rates to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and would not the Interstate Commerce Commission, under such circumstances, knowing that the increased cost of operation had been brought about by the President, listen to his recommendation, which was for an increase of rate?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think they would, but we have heard so much about rubber stamps here during recent sessions of Congress that I am unwilling to make a rubber stamp out of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It might be true that they should act upon the suggestion of the President because he requested them to make an increase, but it seems to me ridiculous that, as the President has the power to control the matter himself, he must go to some subordinate body in order to get power to increase the income.

Mr. FORDNEY. If you are going to make a rubber stamp of him in increasing the operating cost of the railroads, why not make a rubber stamp of him anyway?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the gentleman that if he has the power to increase the operating expenses of the road he has the power to increase the income. We might as well face the situation now, because if there is any deficit in railroad income you will all be called on to vote a tax upon the people in order to make up the deficit to the Treasury, and we might as well provide for some means of providing for it in advance.

Mr. FORDNEY. I agree with you, and that is exactly what we are coming to, in my opinion. I know this, further, and I am half agreeing with the gentleman entirely, the Interstate Commerce Commission for the past decade has not permitted increased rates in the country in keeping with the increased rates on the railroads of other countries in the world. A comparison of statistics will show that. I do not believe they have been fair with the railroads in permitting income in keeping with increased cost of operation. That right ought to be put somewhere where the railroads will get justice in that respect.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think there is a good deal of force in what the gentleman says. Now, it may be true, and I think it is true, that heretofore the Interstate Commerce Commission has not allowed increases in rates proportionate to the increases that were forced upon the railroads in matters of wages and other operating expenses. I am not criticizing the commission for taking that attitude. They may be entirely correct, because in passing upon a rate they pass upon the reasonableness and justness of it, and not necessarily in relation to what they may have been compelled to pay out on some other account. But here is a situation where the Government has come in and supplanted the railroad managers. Previously the railroad managers had the right to initiate a rate, while now under this bill the President has the right to initiate a rate, and it must be a reasonable and just rate. It must be a just or reasonable practice or charge. He is compelled to file that rate with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if any human being complains about the injustice or the unreasonableness of that rate, the Interstate Commerce Commission must investigate it and report the facts back to the President; and their findings are prima facie evidence of their own correctness. Now, the point of difference between some gentlemen, and the point of difference between this provision and the bill as reported to the Senate, was that after the Interstate Commerce Commission has made this investigation they have the power to veto the action of the President and nullify his act, and they may be actuated purely and simply by the reasonableness of the rate itself for the service rendered, wholly independent of any outside circumstances.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman this, as a comparison, that the railroads in Canada for the past few years, under Government control, have spent $102 for every $100 of receipts, which left them no money for betterments of the roads in Canada. Those are Government-owned roads that I refer to now. If that condition were brought about in this country, then there must be increased rates to offset that added cost of operation, or the people must be called upon to go down in their pockets and pay taxes to meet that difference, or the railroads are going into bankruptcy.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is absolutely true.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman states that if the Interstate Commerce Commission decides this, they are limited to the reasonableness of the rates. I want to ask him if under his proposition the same limitation does not rest upon the President?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course.

Mr. LENROOT. And who is more competent to ultimately decide that question, the Interstate Commerce Commission or the President?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think if the President of the United States had the opportunity to go into a long-drawn-out investigation, he might reach as correct an interpretation of the reasonableness of the rates as the Interstate Commerce Commission. And I do not anticipate and I do not think that the gentleman from Wisconsin needs to fear the President of the United States is going to increase or change rates or practices by the wholesale unadvisedly. But now and then there may be a situation that may need to be remedied instantly, where some change not only of a rate that affects the whole country, but some particular local rate, or some practice or some charge in the facilitation of the hauling of freight, may be necessary. If it were necessary for the Interstate Commerce Commission to go into a long investigation, the efficacy of the ruling might be worthless by the time they reached a conclusion about it.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman knows that it is not necessary under the present law for the Interstate Commerce Commission to do that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Railroads, as I suggested a while ago, are not going to initiate any changes of rates, because they get their guaranty just the same, and they have no incentive to do so.

Mr. LENROOT. But the President may now, may he not?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think he can. There is considerable legal doubt as to whether he can do it or not.

Mr. LENROOT. Not to initiate them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Eminent lawyers have said to the contrary, and I think they are wrong; but whether he can or not, that is the very reason this amendment was first brought in here, because they thought he had the power and they did not want him to have the power.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman should bear in mind that there is a distinction between the initiating of rates and the making of rates.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that.

In the demurrage cases that my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] made so much light of, it was necessary to bring about some sort of compulsion in the unloading of freight cars. The Director General, of course, increased the demurrage charges up to $10 a day in order to compel men to unload freight cars and bring about a relief of the congestion.

It turned out afterwards that there had been some prior arrangement made by men under the previous conditions, and he modified his order in order to relieve that situation. But if he had been compelled to go before the Interstate Commerce Commission and subject himself to the delay of an investigation, it would have been too late to have brought about the remedy.

Mr. LENROOT. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. No delay is necessary on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission unless they choose on hearings to suspend this rate. Does the gentleman think they would suspend a rate initiated by the President?

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, if it is assumed that the Interstate Commerce Commission is going to approve everything the President does, if his acts are to be final anyway, I see no use in giving them authority to nullify them absolutely. If that were to be the assumption, he might as well put them in force at once.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is not the gentleman's position logically this: That under private ownership the railroads could initiate a rate, but a check was put upon it by the Interstate Commerce Commission because of the interest of the railroads; and does not that interest disappear the instant they go under Federal control, because the President, who has the power to initiate rates, has no interest whatever in what the rate shall be? It is his interest simply to do that which is best, taking all things into consideration.

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And is it not sufficient, under any circumstances like that, to have the Interstate Commerce Commission merely investigate and advise, because they are advising a man who has no interest and only wants to serve the public?

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman has stated it very correctly and forcibly. Not only is it a fact that the President, as I suggested at the outset, represents in his official capacity the railroads, because he has taken them over and stepped in in place of the managers and directors of the railroads, but the President also represents the public.

Now, the Interstate Commerce Commission was created in order to protect the public against the railroads, and in order to make its powers of any effect it was given the power to enforces its decrees. It was not given merely advisory power with reference to the increase of rates by railroads, because it was presumed that the railroads would not check their increase of rates merely upon the advice of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and therefore the actual power was given to the commission to enforce its decrees. But here the President of the United States has no selfish interests to serve. He has taken over the railroads and in a larger capacity he represents the public, so that it is not necessary to protect the public against their own servant who has been chosen by them to act for them in the administration of the Government.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I wanted to suggest also if it did not come down to this, that in time of war it is necessary to act first and investigate afterwards.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is frequently found to be necessary.

Mr. GORDON. How does it come that Congress has taken a different view about trusting its own chosen servants? If they had so much confidence in the President to fix railroad rates, why did they not leave it to the President when they passed this law? And what is there in time of war to qualify the President to determine such an intricate matter as the fixing of railroad rates?

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman from Ohio is on the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee when they brought the Army bill out gave the President the right to take possession and assume control of the railroads.

Mr. GORDON. Yes; but not to fix rates. You do not find that in the law.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that very well. The gentleman's committee not only did not give the President the right to fix rates, but did not provide any means of compensating the railroads when they were taken over, and that is why this bill is here.

Mr. GORDON. The reason why we did not do that was because we did not know how much money would be necessary. We did not know what the railroads would be worth.

Mr. BARKLEY. Do you know any more now?

Mr. GORDON. No; yes; we know more than we did then, but we do not know that.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have some doubts about that.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. DOREMUS. Under this bill the President is authorized to make these contracts with the railroads. These contracts will provide for a certain return to the road. The Interstate Commerce Commission is no party to that contract. Under those circumstances does not the gentleman think that the Congress should clothe the President with all the power that is necessary to carry out the contract that he makes with the roads?

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely; and he ought not to be handicapped or be put in a situation where he would have to cramp himself or his Government in order to carry out the contract.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not a section of this bill have for its very purpose the purpose to enable the President to carry out that contract? I refer to the $500,000,000 appropriation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; but we do not know how much of that $500,000,000 appropriation is to pay any deficiencies arising by reason of the Government operation. That is only one of the objects.

The primary object of that appropriation is to create a fund out of which the President can construct equipment and rolling stock in order to enable the Government to carry out its war purposes, for which it took over the railroads. Of course if there is a deficit he may pay for it out of this $500,000,000 fund.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. DOREMUS. Which policy does the gentleman think is preferable: To meet a deficit by taxing the people or meet it out of the revenues?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think I have answered that. But the question almost answers itself.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. In just one moment.

Mr. GORDON. I thought you said the question answered itself.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am going to amplify it. I think it will be easier for Congress to give the power to increase the revenues of the roads than to increase the taxes which would be necessary to make up the deficit. The people have to pay for it anyhow, and my experience is that they will be more willing that the deficit shall be paid out of the revenues than that it shall come in the form of taxes out of their own pockets.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does it not come to this, that the fixing of rates involves two sets of people? In one case, if you fix them too high, it involves taxes to all the people, and if you fix the rate just high enough it involves only the shippers?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; and not only that, but——

Mr. GORDON. I would like to supplement that question.

Mr. BARKLEY. I hope the gentleman will get time enough to make a speech himself, because he is evidently loaded up with something that oppresses his system. [Laughter.]

Not only have we got to consider the question of revenues and expenses as they may counteract each other, but one of the main reasons for the taking over of these railroads by the Government was the fact that there is an intimate financial relationship existing between the railroad companies and the stockholders, and the Government of the United States by reason of this fact. There is about to be put upon the market another Liberty loan campaign. There ought not to be any competition between the Government of the United States and any other great interest in the money market, and we know that the money markets have been closed to the railroads for the last two or three years. The railroads have been unable to borrow money, and that is one reason why some of their equipment has gone down. The money markets of the world have been closed to the railroads, and this was necessary to be taken into consideration in taking these railroads over not only to unify their physical control but to unify the relationship between the financial situation of the railroads and of the Government of the United States, and it might be a very embarrassing and disastrous situation if by reason of handicapping and dividing authority to control the railroads the Government were not able to provide revenues sufficient to carry them on.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to ask this question: The gentleman says, as I understand it, that he thinks instead of being levied upon the people by general taxation it ought to be levied upon the shippers, a special class, and that that would be more equitable. The railroads are being taken over for the benefit of all the people, are they not?

Mr. BARKLEY. Why, yes, in a large sense.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is it not true, then, that you ought not to impose a special burden on a special class of people, namely, the shippers, when the taking over is for the benefit of the whole people? Do you not think your argument about that is wrong?

Mr. BARKLEY. No, I do not; and I will tell the gentleman why. If the Government had not taken over the railroads, in all probability there would have been a very large increase in wages to their employees. I think it is practically certain that there would have been an increase. There might have been more of an increase than there will be under the Government. If that increase had come under private ownership the public would have had to pay for it in the payment of freight rates. There is not any doubt about that, because the railroads, either under private or public control, ought to take in as much money as they pay out. Now, does the situation change merely because as a war measure the President was compelled to take over the roads? Ought they not to pay their operating expenses? Ought they not to pay for their increased equipment? Ought they not to be able to pay these things out of earnings? Ought they be taken out of the Treasury, merely because the Government has taken over the roads? I do not think so.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The answer to that is that the burden that is being assumed by the Government is being assumed for the benefit of all of us.

Mr. GORDON. On account of the war.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. On account of the war and of war conditions; but your plan proposes to place a burden on a special class of people who ship stuff over the railroads.

Mr. BARKLEY. That statement is only partially true.

Mr. PLATT. The shipper does not have to pay it. He passes it on.

Mr. BARKLEY. The shipper pays it initially, but the people, after all, pay all freight and all taxes alike. It is distributed among the people, and in such form and in such quantities that they may not always feel the burden; and it is an unwise financial policy to inaugurate here in the very beginning the possibility of creating more expenses than the revenues of the railroads will be able to meet.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let me add to that question that under normal conditions perhaps that argument is correct, but when you have a special fixing of prices of certain things—for instance food, which constitutes a large part of the shipments by freight in this country—then another element enters into the question of governmental control which perhaps you have lost sight of in your argument.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is difficult, of course, to separate that part of it that is incidental to the war from that part which is incidental to commercial traffic generally.

But having taken them over as a war policy, the Government must assume the burden of carrying the commercial traffic with the same wisdom and financial foresight. It could not throw aside all rules of finance, because, having taken them over as a war measure, they have to regulate the charges incident to commercial traffic.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. PLATT. I want to ask a question in reference to this provision that all fares, rates, and charges shall be fair, reasonable, and just. Would the gentleman hold that the President under this bill, if it passes as it is, would not be allowed to initiate a rate, perhaps for the purpose of shutting off some traffic? Suppose the excursionists were coming to Washington and crowding the accommodations; would the President have the right to raise the passenger rates to keep people from traveling?

Mr. BARKLEY. It would all be subject to the provision that they must be just and reasonable. In England it so happens that they did raise the passenger rates 50 per cent in order to discourage passenger travel. It was necessary in order to carry the freight traffic of the railroads to discourage passenger travel by increasing the rates more than 50 per cent. Whether that would be a wise policy in this country I do not say; it will all depend on circumstances.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I think the gentleman has presented the question of the right of the President to initiate rates very forcibly. Would not it be an anomaly to have two executive administrative officers, and one of them a subordinate, allowed to overrule his superior? If the Interstate Commerce Commission as an administrative body were allowed to finally overrule the action of the President in fixing these rates, would not that in itself be an anomaly and an absurdity?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a ridiculous situation, which I called attention to a while ago. The railroads were taken over in order to unify them, because under separate competitive systems and boards of directors they desired to get all the traffic and revenue they could, and they could not unify themselves. Now, unification or physical control is wholly incomplete unless the unification of financial control goes hand in hand with it. It is a ridiculous situation to say that a subordinate body can overrule the action of the President in a great war crisis.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman consider the President of the United States in the same position that the railroad companies themselves were under the law?

Mr. BARKLEY. Before they were taken over?

Mr. MADDEN. Before and after they are taken over is not he in the attitude of the railway company, in the same position?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; he steps in, and what authority they exercise now is through his consent and by reason of the permission that he gives.

Mr. MADDEN. If he takes the place that the railroad company formerly occupied, could he have any greater power to initiate rates and put them into effect than the railroad companies themselves had?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; for the reason I suggested a moment ago. Not only does he take the place of the railroad companies, but the desire or incentive of the railroad companies to gouge the public is removed. He not only stands in the relationship of the railroad managers, but he represents the public and has no desire to increase rates unreasonably. There is no logical reason why the Interstate Commerce Commission should stand between him and the public when he is the representative of the public as much as they are.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say, and the purpose of his argument was, that the President might have a superior power to increase a rate, to get increased compensation which the Interstate Commerce Commission as a body would not allow.

Mr. BARKLEY. I say that is one situation that enters into the wisdom of giving him the power to do that; there may be a hundred others, but that is one. It is presumed that freights may be changed, may be rerouted, taken off one road and put on others, and it would be a serious embarrassment if the President did not have the right to change rates, charges, or practices so as to facilitate the transportation of freight over one road or another which had never enjoyed the transportation of that freight.

Mr. MADDEN. Then what becomes of the gentleman's argument that the President is not in the same position to gouge the public by charging increased and unreasonable rates which the railroad companies were themselves in before he took them over?

Mr. BARKLEY. I say he has no incentive to do that.

Mr. MADDEN. If he increases the rates beyond what they are, what would the gentleman call it?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not qualified to pass on the reasonableness of any rate, and I do not know what it is going to be. I do not believe that any President in opposition to the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission would insist on an unreasonable rate on freight.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GORDON. You have provided in this bill that any rate fixed, whether by the President or anybody else, must be just and reasonable?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. And yet the gentleman is arguing for the arbitrary power in the President to impose a rate, just or unjust?

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no. The gentleman misses the whole question involved.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman is also arguing that the President when he finds that the rate he has imposed is unjust and unreasonable through an investigation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, shall as an honest man proceed to change it. Why not allow the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix it before it becomes operative and effective, just exactly as it did before this war started?

Mr. BARKLEY. Because there might be a hundred circumstances when immediate action is necessary to facilitate transportation of freight or protect the interests of the people, and if you give him power with reference to one thing, you must give him power with reference to the whole field, because Congress can not divide up the field and say that the President shall have the right to fix such rates as shall affect the war; but as to commercial rates he shall have no power, because it is impossible in a legislative way to draw the line between strictly war business and commercial traffic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. May I have 10 minutes more?

Mr. SIMS. I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BARKLEY. The last thing I desire to discuss, and I am sorry that I have taken so much time, is the question of the tenure of Government control as provided in this bill. I am one of those who do not believe there ought to be any time limit fixed in this bill, not because I may or may not favor Government ownership, nor because I believe that Government ownership necessarily is coming. It is wholly unnecessary to discuss the question of Government ownership in deciding upon whether there shall be a time limit after the proclamation of peace within which these roads shall pass back to their private owners. This bill provides that the Government shall, if necessary, buy equipment, rolling stock; it may even buy and build terminal facilities or branches, extensions of the line. It may even, under the bill, buy the bonds that are permitted to be issued by order of the President in order that the railroads shall not come into competition with the Government in the borrowing of money. If this war should last for three or four years—and I do not think even Solomon himself, if he were here, and he enjoyed some reputation for being a wise man, could tell anything about how long the war is going to last—I do not believe anybody in Congress or in the United States is wise enough now to say in advance what character of laws may be necessary in providing for the return of these roads to their private owners. It may be that we will have to spend more than a billion and a half of dollars, it may be $2,000,000,000, in the purchase and the construction of equipment necessary to carry on the railroads while the war is in progress. It may be that under the provisions of this bill the Government will purchase bonds issued by the railroads, because they can not issue bonds under this bill except by approval of the President, and he is authorized, if necessary, in order to take the railroads out of competition with the Government in the issue of bonds, to purchase those bonds on behalf of the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the gentleman on the proposition of what right we have under the Constitution to hold these railroads after the war is over for more than a reasonable time.

Mr. BARKLEY. If I get time, I shall come to that, but I do not want to interrupt my thought right now. It will take at least a year after the war is over and peace is proclaimed to bring the soldiers back from Europe. It may happen that it will be necessary entirely to revolutionize the character of control that the railroads shall resume after they are turned back to their owners. I think we may predict with reasonable certainty that they will never be turned back under the old competitive conditions that existed prior to their taking over by the Government. We might as well recognize the fact that this is not only a military war, a world-wide conflict between military powers, but the result of this war will be a universal world-wide economic revolution, brought about by reason of or during the progress of the war. We may assume, I think, with a reasonable degree of certainty that these roads will not be turned back to their owners under the same conditions that existed prior to the time the Government took them over.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, Congress is going to be in session annually right along after the war is over. Is there any reason why, when that time comes, Congress then in existence should not be allowed to control the matter under the conditions that then exist?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course that is true, but I want to submit a suggestion as to the unwisdom of having a time limit for that reason.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not now, I have only 10 minutes. We have not the power of foresight to tell us what sort of legislation will be necessary. The bill provides for a two-year limit. If it should happen that in those two years the economic and financial conditions of the world are such, and the relations of the Government have become entwined and entangled with these railroads to such an extent that they can not be untangled in two years, then either we must turn back those roads automatically without any provision of law under the old competitive and chaotic conditions, or we must extend the time limit beyond the two years.

Mr. SHERLEY. What does the gentleman say to the converse of that, where if you happen to have a President that wanted Government ownership it would take two-thirds of the Congress to undo it?

Mr. BARKLEY. It takes two-thirds of the Congress to override any veto of the President, and I do not think we should act unwisely because of any fear of a veto.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; for this reason, that the war is a reason for doing things now, but it is not a reason for making it a continuing condition.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I would like to ask the gentleman what power the President has to hold a railroad after the conclusion of peace? Tell me what power he has to hold a road after the declaration of peace?

Mr. BARKLEY. Congress in time of peace can pass a law taking over every railroad in the United States under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Has he got the power now?

Mr. BARKLEY. And if Congress can do it in time of peace, Congress has the power in time of war to say that under the commerce clause it can continue their possession and operation after the war is over. In the absence of congressional action he could only keep them for a reasonable time after the war. If the time should be about to expire, and Congress has not acted, and there is an uncertainty in the money market, $18,000,000,000 worth of securities are hanging by a thread; nobody knows what Congress will do, and if Congress hesitates and vacillates, and there may be a division between the Senate and the House or a division between the Congress and the President, and we should from time to time be compelled to pass a resolution of extension, that very uncertainty would put in motion such fear, doubt, and lack of confidence as might bring about in the United States a panic the like of which we have never seen since the Government began. Therefore I believe it is better to leave this matter to the wisdom of some future Congress without tying their hands, without compelling them to act with a stop watch, and depend upon the vision and the wisdom of some future Congress to act in the light of the circumstances that may then exist, and not try now to handicap them.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield for a short question.

Mr. MADDEN. This is an important bill and, I take it, involves all the value of the railroad companies in the United States, and it will not take more than a week to pass it, and I assume it will not take but two or three or four days to pass the legislation that will be necessary after the war closes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, if the gentleman means to say that after this war is over, and the relationship between the railroads and their competitors is entirely wiped out, and the Government becomes entangled in the mesh of financial operating relations between railroads, that a law might be passed within a week providing for that situation, it is not doing the intelligence and the foresight of the gentleman from Illinois justice. It might be possible to pass a bill within a week after it is brought in the Congress, but who can tell how long it will take for the Government and Congress to determine what sort of a bill ought to be passed, and what sort of a permanent policy should be adopted with reference to the railroads?

Mr. MADDEN. It will not take very long to pass this one, and this is a very important bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. We are passing this with a great deal more expedition than we would if it were not so important and necessary to get it off our hands right now. When this war is over and we are considering the changes coming out of it, we need not try now to blind ourselves to the conditions existing then whether we are for or against Government ownership. We can not stop the current of human progress, if people should favor permanent control, by placing a two-year limit upon the expiration of the term of Government control. I have heretofore referred to the fact that prior to the Civil War the Supreme Court thought it had settled the slavery question when it rendered the Dred-Scott decision. It did not settle it at all. It took four years of war to settle that question. I mention that not because this law will have a like result, but because it is impossible for Congress or courts to stem the tide of human progress in any direction the people may determine upon. It certainly can not be done by attempting to dam up the stream. I believe it to be the part of wisdom to leave the time open in order that future Congresses may deal with it in the light of the conditions that will exist after the war is over. I am not afraid to trust any Congress that the American people will select to deal wisely with this question, not under compulsion or limitation, but with vision, patriotism, and experience, in the light of the new conditions that will come as a result of the war, so that the interests of stockholders, the Government, and the American people may be safeguarded and protected. No suitable adjustment can be made or even forecast now. None should be attempted in blindness. The light we have to-day does not penetrate far enough into the future to reveal what may be necessary then. Let us leave the solution of that problem to those who may be called on to deal with it when peace and readjustment shall have approached. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the other side has used 2 hours and 25 minutes this afternoon I would like to yield to three or four Members on this side in succession.

Mr. SIMS. That will be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I have no desire to take up much time during the general debate on the bill which we are now considering. I believe that this is a time when every Member of this body should confine himself to things worth while, and the important issues which are before us relative to the great war in which we are now taking part. But this measure is a war measure in which we are all interested, and I believe it is one of the most important and far-reaching propositions our Government has ever undertaken, because there is involved in this measure the taking over by our Government of private property which is valued at approximately seventeen or eighteen billion dollars. I am one of the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, which held hearings and considered this measure—and at this point I want to congratulate the chairman, Judge SIMS, on the efficient manner and the successful way in which he conducted the hearings on this bill. In taking up this measure for consideration, I believe it is the duty of every Member of this body to consider the most important fundamental principle involved in this bill, and that is, the Government is taking over the railroads of our country to control and operate the same, as a real necessity, to help us and our allies to win the war. I believe that is the first and most important question which every Member ought to bear in mind while we are considering this measure.

There are two sections of this bill—sections 11 and 14—in which I am intensely interested and desire to express myself upon them at this time. Section 11 relates to the liabilities of common carriers while under Federal control. Section 11 says:

That carriers while under Federal control shall, in so far as is not inconsistent therewith, or with the provisions of this act, or any other act applicable to such Federal control, or with any order of the President, be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under State or Federal laws or at common law. Suits may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law, and in any suit against the carrier no defense shall be made thereto upon the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the Federal Government. But no process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property under such Federal control.

I desire to say that this section was considered very carefully by the committee who had charge of the bill, and we were concerned very much regarding the wording of this section, which has to do with the rights and remedies to recover for injuries and damages which we now have under State and Federal laws. The wording of the section says that the carrier shall be liable, and that suits may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law. I must confess that I know very little about law, as I am not a lawyer or a member of that honorable profession, but I want to call your attention to the words starting in line 2, page 12, "or with any order of the President be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers." Now, it seems to me, that these words are very clear, for it states that the railroads shall be liable for all damages, providing the order which might have caused the damage or injury was not issued by the President or some one vested with power under Government control. Now, what I want to know is—and I trust some of the lawyers of this body will explain these words before we finish this bill—who is going to be liable for injuries or damages which may have been caused by an order of the President or the Director General of the railroads while they are under Government control. Mr. STINESS, of Rhode Island, brought the question before the committee, and he cited such an instance as this: Supposing that a certain locomotive or railway equipment was not in a safe condition to make a trip over the road, and on account of the condition of such equipment the division superintendent or the train master refused to let the locomotive, train, or cars go over the road until it was in good condition and safe to the traveling public and employees of the railroad. Now, let us suppose that the Director General or some one with Government authority ordered this equipment to be moved, stating that it was a war necessity, and a serious accident happened by reason of this defective equipment. What I want to know is, Who would be liable for damages in a case of this kind? Surely no court would hold that the carrier was liable. And then, again, I want to call the lawyers' attention to the words in lines 9, 10, and 11, on page 12, which say:

That no process shall be levied against any property while under Federal control.

It seems to me that when a party sues and gets final judgment in his favor it is evidence conclusive that he is entitled to payment of the same; and in the case of a badly injured employee, if he can not obtain it, great suffering and loss is the probable result. Now, if one was to get judgment against the carrier, section 11 says that no process can be levied against the property of the carrier while said property is under Federal control. Now, I fully realize that this being a war measure it would be a bad thing to frame this bill in such a way as to let anyone who might have secured a claim for damages against the carrier tie up the road or equipment; but I do wish the chairman of this committee or some one would suggest an amendment to this section which would enable the injured employee or creditor to get his pay and at the same time fully protect the Federal Government in the use, possession, and control of the property so sold.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman come to the conclusion that there is no effective remedy for this?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I do not think so under this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. What was the consensus of opinion in the committee?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. That question was discussed very carefully, and I do not believe there were many members of the committee that cared to say that this section fully protected an injured person who might be entitled to recover damages.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's opinion accords with my own, for I do not believe there is any remedy.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, a suit might be brought against the railroad and a recovery had, because it makes no difference whether the Government is liable or the road is liable, it all comes out of the operating expenses and is charged up to that.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. That is not in the bill. If you will put it in the bill I will support it.

Mr. BARKLEY. The bill provides that every employee shall have the same remedy against the company that he had before. That is not limited by the fact that the Director General might order any train to go over any part of the road.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I understand that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has an amendment to the section, and I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. The laws of the States are not applicable if they are in conflict with the order of the President.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Section 14, which has to do with the length of time that the Federal Government shall control the railroads after the war is over, was discussed probably more than any other section in the bill. I believe that the railroads should go back to their owners no later than one year after the proclamation of peace, but there are some who would have the Government control the railroads indefinitely. Some members of the committee desire this. Mr. McAdoo, the Director General, and Mr. Anderson, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, favor indefinite control of the railroads. Now, I claim that the act of August, 1916, does not give the President the power to take over the railroads to control and operate them in times of peace. This act provides that the President in time of war shall have the power to take over our railroads—for what? For the transportation of troops, war material and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency. When this power was given to the President, it was not contemplated that it should be used in times of peace. When this power was granted we were having trouble with Mexico and were getting into the European conflict as fast as we could. But there was a limitation placed in this act, and that was that the President should be vested with this power during the time of war. We find that this same power was given to the President during the Civil War. In the act passed January 31, 1862, we find in section 5 these words:

And be it further enacted, That this act, so far as it relates to the operating and using said railroads, shall not be in force any longer than is necessary for the suppression of this rebellion.

And I read from the minority view the following:

We believe that such control should terminate as speedily as is consistent with due regard for the rights and interests of both the Government and the carriers and that one year or less after the proclamation of peace within which to make the proper readjustments would be reasonable. Congress in practically every war-emergency bill it has enacted has limited its operation to "the continuance of the war" or to six months or one year thereafter. It did this in the priority-of-shipments act, the espionage act, the trading-with-the-enemy act, the food control and food survey acts.

Now, why should we extend this power in the time of peace? I believe that to take over the railroads indefinitely means Government ownership, and at this time I am unalterably opposed to our Government undertaking such a proposition. If we are going to embark in Government ownership of railroads, we should take up this question in times of peace, not when the world is all afire and upside down. I, for one, am not ready to go into the question of Government ownership at this time. If we take up this question at all, we should meet it in the daylight, and not in the dark. If we are going to consider this question, let us meet it in the right spirit and at the right time, when our country is normal, not abnormal.

But there are some who would have the question of Government ownership sneak into this bill like the prowler comes into your home at night. Under the pretense of it being a war measure, they are trying to force upon the people of this country Government ownership without any study whatsoever of the question.

To place in this bill an indefinite time as to when the railroads shall go back to their owners, we create an uncertainty which would take the heart out of the men who have had charge of the operation of our railroads previous to the war. It seems to me that in order to keep our railroads up to the highest standard of efficiency we should set a definite time in this bill as to when these roads should go back to their owners and operators. Why some should want to experiment with Government ownership at this time I do not know, for it is a known fact that under Government ownership and control of railroads in other countries the cost of operation and the rates far exceed those of our own country under private control, and at the same time the service is not nearly as efficient, and the wages of the employees are much lower. The wage conditions of the American railway employees are bad to-day. Let me say in passing, while I am on this question, that I believe the railroad men are the poorest paid class of skilled workmen in our country to-day, and to my mind the Government should at once grant an increase in wages to the American railroad employees. They are entitled to an increase, and should have it.

I listened with much attention to the speech of my colleague, Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska, which he delivered on Tuesday. I can not agree with Brother STEPHENS when he says that the railroads of this country are operated by a gang of highbinders, crooks, and wrecking crews, as he calls them. I believe that there are just as honest, noble, patriotic, big business men at the head of the operating departments of our railroads as there are in any of the other business institutions of our country.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit, I think the gentleman from Ohio has somewhat misunderstood the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS]. I do not think he referred to the railroad officials in general, but he meant to be understood, when he used the term "highbinders and thieves," to refer to that class of people that wrecked the Rock Island and the New Haven.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. It is true that he referred to the Rock Island and the New Haven, but because they went wrong it does not follow that all the rest of the managers of the railroads in the country are highbinders and thieves. Most of these men have gone through the hard knocks of life, and through perseverance, hard work, and honesty have worked up the ladder to the top. I can not understand why some people are forever knocking the railroads and calling their owners and operators highbinders and crooks, for I think I can say that the United States has the finest and the most efficient system of railroads of any country in the world. And yet there is no business or industry in this country which has been legislated against and condemned more than our railroads. Let us try and be fair to the railroads and give them a square deal and help them when they need helping instead of clubbing them when they are down, such as they are now, which was brought on by no fault of theirs, but by reason of the great abnormal condition which exists in the world to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take the time of the committee. I yield back the time, if I may have unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is he going to extend his remarks upon this bill?

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I decline to answer the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MASON. Then I shall take the time. I am much obliged to the guardian of the ink pot who permits me to waste two or three days to present to the people of this country the humble petition of the Irish-Americans who wish to get into the RECORD a statement by Mr. McCartan in regard to the effect of the proposed conscription, which could have been inserted within the past two days without taking the time of the committee, and I take the 10 minutes now to read his statement. If I shall read a little fast in order to conserve and economize time, I hope the distinguished gentleman who is opposed to the filing of this petition will make due allowance for my fast reading.

[Memorandum dispatched to the Secretary of State of the United States from the envoy of the provisional government of Ireland.]

FEBRUARY 17, 1918.

SIR: As the representative of the provisional government of Ireland, accredited to the United States, I have the honor to request you to bring to the notice of your Government the following observations concerning the treaty now in process of negotiation between the United States on the one hand and Great Britain on the other, whereby residents in the United States who are claimed as nationals by Great Britain may become available for military purposes.

The Irish born who reside in this country are separated by the American Government into three categories: First, American citizens by naturalization; second, declarants, or "such as have taken out their first naturalization papers and thereby declare their intention and desire to become full citizens of the United States"; third, aliens, those whose status as Irish nationals is beyond question.

Over the members of the first of these categories the United States alone exerts authority, an authority which the contemplated treaty can not influence, and which the provisional government of Ireland fully recognizes.

The formal declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States is accompanied by an explicit statement of purpose to renounce allegiance to the sovereignty to which the declarant is subject. Basing its action upon this purpose of renunciation, Congress ordained, by the selective-service act of 1917, that cobelligerent declarants were liable to military duty in the United States on the same terms as citizens by birth or by adoption. In other words, citizens and declarants were placed upon an equality of sacrifice in defense of the United States. The ratio of cobelligerent declarants called to those accepted for service was higher than that among citizens naturalized by pre-war legal forms, and only slightly lower than that among citizens by birth. (Provost Marshal General's Report, p. 55.)

Civic sacrifice carries with it an inalienable right to privileges. This principle is well recognized by your Government and already modifies the process of naturalization for enlisted aliens in the Army and Navy. No State can in equity require the sacrifice of life to civic duty from any but a citizen. The enforcement by the State, and the acceptance by the cobelligerent declarants, of the supreme duty inherent to citizenship constituted a contract between the State and cobelligerent declarants. That contract implicitly extended to cobelligerent declarants the right to the privilege of citizenship of the United States. The selective-service act of 1917 in equity naturalized cobelligerent declarants, and was in accord with the established policy of the United States as laid down in section 1999 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Cobelligerent declarants were called upon for military service as a class. The demand for military service made upon them differed in no particular from the demand made upon other classes of citizen. Accident of age, ballot, health, or other circumstance, caused certain of these declarants to be discharged, exempted, rejected, or not called upon; but similar accidents affected in precisely similar ways both native-born and naturalized citizens. Such accidents can, therefore, in nowise affect the status of citizenship conferred implicitly by the selective-service act upon all cobelligerent declarants; that act was in nature a contract which can not be modified by treaty or convention.

As the provisional government of Ireland are maintaining on a front, where allied unity is not at present possible, the principle of self-determination, and as the United States Government entered the war to champion that principle, our respective countries are de facto cobelligerents, associates in a common struggle for this common cause. The fundamental right of every human being to voluntary expatriation, a right upon which your great country is built, a right for which many of your noblest died in the Wars of 1776 and of 1812, a right specifically established here for declarants by the expatriation law of 1868, a constitutional right which no executive officer may violate and which no treaty may restrict was exercised in intent by those of Irish birth who became declarants here. The provisional government of Ireland accepting the obligation implied by this cobelligerency, and upholding the right of expatriation, did not protest the inclusion of Irish-born declarants in the scope of the selective-service act of 1917, but tacitly acquiesced in that inclusion, which was therefore legally established. Hence it is far from my duty now to question the legality of this established fact; but I must protest against any attempt to reopen the matter by treaty or convention with a third power—Great Britain. The inclusion of the Irish born, who are declarant citizens, in the scope of the pending Anglo-American treaty would be contrary to justice and equity; would be a reversal by treaty of the action of Congress in the expatriation law of 1868 and in the selective-service act of 1917; would be an unconstitutional exercise of treaty-making authority; and would be a repudiation of the traditional American principles and policy. Hence the provisional government of Ireland refuses to believe that the Government of the United States has in contemplation any treaty with Great Britain which would discriminate against a group of coopted American citizens—the Irish declarants—who in this war have shown themselves the most devotedly loyal of all American citizens.

A treaty with Great Britain may properly concern only American residents of British origin who have made no legal expression of intent to become a citizen. The term "British" is correctly applied only to the English, Scotch, and Welsh. The Government of Great Britain—i. e., of England, Scotland, and Wales—has the right to enter into agreements with the United States regarding only the British residents here and the resident who was formerly an inhabitant of a British Crown colony such as Jamaica, which is governed from the British colonial office. But Great Britain can not enter into agreements on behalf of the self-governing dominions such as Canada. Hence, I am informed, Canadian aliens are included in this treaty by a separate convention with the Government of Canada. Canada could enter into such an arrangement for the draft is legal in Canada. But citizens of a self-governing colony, which like South Africa has refused to consider conscription, or which like Australia has specifically rejected conscription, can not be made subjects of draft conventions between the United States and Great Britain without impugning their jealously cherished rights of sovereignty. To conscript Boers or Australians here would be not only to deny the right of self-determination which these people claim and now enjoy, but would also be tantamount to American recognition of the right of England to conscript Boers and Australians as the Romans conscripted the barbarians—without the sanction of the conscripted and for the benefit of the Empire; that is, England.

Last summer the British premier, in the name of and by the authority of the British Government, declared that a convention of Irishmen should meet to determine a plan for the government of Ireland within the British Empire. He thus conceded that Ireland is a small nationality, entitled to government by Irishmen; and in a somewhat Teutonic form he applied the principle of self-determination to Ireland by creating the Irish convention. Even the British thus pretend to recognize Ireland's right to be self-governing. Even the British do not attempt to apply conscription in Ireland. And the Provisional Government of Ireland wholly denies the authority of Great Britain, or of any other State, to conscript such Irish nationals as circumstance has for the moment removed from the protection of the Provisional Government of Ireland. It has not been the habit of the Government of your great, liberty-loving Republic to exploit the defenseless; and I am confident our Government need be under no apprehensions now on this score. Hence, in submitting this memorandum against the inclusion of Irish nationals in the scope of the pending treaty, I wish clearly to disavow all intention to impute to your Government the motive which might be supposed to require this protest. Among the Irish here who have not already volunteered are refugees of the revolutionary government of Ireland. It is of the ethics of statehood to give sanctuary to political refugees. Even the unspeakable Turk refused, at the risk of war, to deliver up to Austria and Russia the Hungarian revolutionaries who within living memory sought haven at Constantinople. And I do not for a moment fear that the Irish refugees in the United States who conscientiously object to aid, either directly or indirectly, in the aggrandizement of the British Empire will be forced by treaty to attempt to flee to Mexico in search of a safety denied them here.

The results to be obtained from the inclusion of the Irish in such a treaty are negligible. Among immigrants the Irish are of the first to seek citizenship. Of the hundreds of thousands of adolescent Irishmen who before the war found existence impossible in an English-ridden Ireland almost all have become declarants or citizens, almost all are taking their place alongside the native-born American in this war. For the total number of Irish aliens between the ages of 21 and 30, inclusive, registered in the United States was only 20,840. Would there be any need to impress the handful of these who when called would not volunteer, if the four and a half divisions, which Sir F. E. Smith told us were with machine guns governing Ireland, were sent to France?

In objecting to conscription here under a British treaty, Irishmen are influenced solely by the desire not to compromise their nationality. In the American Army about 25 per cent of the draft are of the Irish race. Indeed, among the cobelligerent aliens here who were called in the draft, and, who, waiving the exemption to which they were entitled as aliens, were accepted for service, the Irish ranked easily first in devotion to the country which was giving them sanctuary. From the Provost Marshal General's report, appendix 33a, the following percentages are computed:

Percentage of the total alien cobelligerents called who waived exemption and were accepted.

Ireland	30.4
Scotland	24.2
England	22.5
Wales	22.0
Serbia	21.7
Canada	21.0
France	19.4
Italy	16.8

Of the total registered citizens and declarants called 27.06 per cent were certified for service. (Provost Marshal General's Report, p. 55, table 27.) The Irish alien, with 30.4 per cent, has therefore already made a relatively better contribution to the defense of the United States in this war than even the United States citizen. I can not conceive that he is now to be rewarded for this unequaled demonstration of friendship for the United States by a treaty which makes his nationality a matter of barter between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain.

On January 5 Premier Lloyd-George announced that Great Britain was fighting for the principle of self-determination; extended the application of that principle even to the African Askari. On February 11 President Wilson, in his address to Congress, asserted that America's essential aim in the war was to establish the principle of self-determination in the law of nations. It is axiomatic that a principle worthy of the sacrifice which civilization is being called upon to offer in this contest, must be of universal application, valid alike for friend and for foe; that those to whom the benefits of the principle are denied may not be conscripted for sacrifice to secure these benefits for others; and that no power can rightly claim to be devoting men, money, and munitions to the defense of a principle which that power does not observe within its own territory. As Ireland is indisputably a nation, the principle of self-determination is as applicable to Ireland as it is, say, to Poland or to Palestine; the Irish must first be guaranteed the exercise of their own right of self-determination before they can be expected to die for the freedom of foreign nationalities; and so long as that guaranty is refused, the validity of the principle is questionable, and the right of the allies to champion that principle needs proof. No group can justly seek to impose by force upon a selected enemy a principle which is repudiated by any of its members; self-determination is not a punitive principle to be applied only to the enemy.

Any treaty by which Irish nationals would become liable to conscription here, if arranged without the sanction of the provisional government of Ireland, would violate the right not merely of Irish Nationals but of plain people everywhere, and would implicity discredit the good faith of any champion of self-determination who might be party to it. Hence, I feel assured that the Government of the United States will not enter into any treaty with the Government of Great Britain, by which the Irish people here will be "bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game."

I am, sir,

Your obedient servant,

PATRICK MCCARTAN, F. R. C. S.,
Envoy of the Provisional Government of Ireland.

Mr. Chairman, the reason I wanted that in the RECORD is not only because it was requested by my constituents, but because I wanted to bring it before the Congress, and I have no doubt that the question raised by Mr. McCartan will be provided for. It will be hardly fair for our Government to ask for, or the Government of Great Britain to attempt to give, the power to conscript men in this country whom she can not conscript in their own country.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. RUSSELL, as Speaker pro tempore, having assumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9685 and had come to no resolution thereon.

PANAMA RAILROAD CO. (S. DOC. NO. 179).

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the sixty-eighth annual report of the board of directors of the Panama Railroad Co. for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, that is a very unusual form in which to make such a request. Is the gentleman present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not see him.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is a very unusual form. However, if the gentleman is not here, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 22, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 22, 1918.

(Legislative day of Thursday, February 21, 1918.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Smoot
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sterling
Curtis	Kellogg	Owen	Stone
Dillingham	Kendrick	Page	Sutherland

Gerry	Lewis	Shafroth	Trammell
Hale	McKellar	Sheppard	Vardaman
Hardwick	McNary	Sherman	Warren
Henderson	Martin	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Hollis	New	Smith, Md.
Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Smith, S. C.

Mr. McNARY. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on account of illness.

Mr. LEWIS. Permit me to announce the absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], occasioned by personal illness. I ask to have the announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent owing to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Among the rules of the Senate is the following rule:

No request by a Senator for unanimous consent for the taking of a final vote on a specified date upon the passage of a bill or joint resolution shall be submitted to the Senate for agreement thereto until, upon a roll call ordered for the purpose by the presiding officer, it shall be disclosed that a quorum of the Senate is present; and when a unanimous consent is thus given, the same shall operate as the order of the Senate, but any unanimous consent may be revoked by another unanimous consent granted in the manner prescribed above upon one day's notice.

In accordance with that rule, the Senate entered into this unanimous-consent agreement:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m., on the legislative day of Thursday, February 21, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill S. 3752, a bill to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that from and after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. up to the hour of 6 o'clock p. m. of the calendar day of Thursday, February 21, 1918, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill or any amendment offered thereto; and that after the last-named hour on the said calendar day of Thursday, February 21, 1918, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon the bill or any amendment offered thereto.

It will be observed that by this unanimous-consent agreement the bill (S. 3752) must proceed to its final disposition through the regular parliamentary stages during the legislative day of February 21, 1918. The Senate held until 6 o'clock of the calendar day of February 21, 1918, at which time the right to 10-minute speeches upon the bill or any amendment thereto expired. It then recessed until to-day, the calendar day of February 22, at the hour of 11 o'clock a. m. This still being the legislative day of February 21, 1918, there is nothing in the unanimous-consent agreement that requires a vote to be taken at any definite hour upon the legislative day of February 21, 1918.

There is another order of the Senate made in the year 1901 to the effect that, unless otherwise ordered, on the 22d day of February in each year, or if that day shall be on Sunday, then on the day following, immediately after the reading of the Journal, Washington's Farewell Address shall be read to the Senate by a Senator to be designated for the purpose by the presiding officer.

The Chair is confronted by two orders of the Senate. If they could not be construed together so as to keep each of them in force the Chair would be compelled to hold that the unanimous-consent agreement touching the pending bill took precedence. But the Chair does not believe that there is any conflict between the two agreements in view of the fact that no Senator can lose any right. The debate will not thereby be cut off if the Chair shall hold that the order with reference to the reading of Washington's Farewell Address is in order. The Chair believes it is in order, and unless there be an appeal taken from the Chair the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] will now be directed to read the Farewell Address of George Washington, and at the conclusion of it the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business under the unanimous-consent agreement, and will continue the consideration thereof unless the Senate chooses to recess until to-morrow.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. STONE. At the conclusion of the reading of the Farewell Address of George Washington the unfinished business will either upon the request of the Senator in charge or automatically come before the Senate. Now, at that point I inquire whether it would not be in order for the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], or any other Senator for that matter, but I say especially the Senator from South Carolina, as he is in charge of this legislation, to move a recess of the Senate until such hour as he may name to-morrow?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is just what the Chair ruled.

Mr. STONE. I was not quite clear as to the Chair's ruling.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Chair ruled. Is there any objection to the ruling of the Chair? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Rhode Island will read the Farewell Address of George Washington.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

Mr. GERRY read the address, as follows:

To the people of the United States.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter.—Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discrimination,—northern and southern,—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head: they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions: that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country: that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular reference to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism—but this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight), the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the Government and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true, and in governments of a monarchial cast patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern: some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundations of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should co-operate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak, toward a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is in extending our commercial relations to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people under an efficient government the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our Nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without anything more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors and dangers.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES,
17th September, 1796.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is now before the Senate, and, in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement, five-minute speeches only are allowed upon the bill and any amendment thereto.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to urge the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is in charge of the pending legislation, with which I would not interfere except by his consent, out of compliment to the memory of George Washington—whose last address, containing his final advice and admonition to the American people, has just been read, and who still remains and, in my opinion, should always be esteemed as the first citizen of the Republic, past or present—to move a recess of the Senate until to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I am fully aware of the debt of obligation we owe to George Washington; but I am quite sure that if he were alive to-day, with the emergency that is on, with the patriotism that always characterized him, he would tell us to go on and meet this emergency now. I do not think the Senate can pay a higher tribute to George Washington than, holding his memory in our hearts as we do, to emulate his example by doing our duty first. Therefore I think we had better go on with the bill.

SHORTAGE OF SUGAR AND COAL.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as a member of the committee, I give notice that if I can secure recognition on Wednesday, February 27, immediately after the close of the routine morning business, I shall ask the permission of the Senate to address them briefly on the testimony gathered by the committee appointed to investigate the shortage of sugar and coal.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the pending amendment is, I think, the amendment offered by myself last evening. That amendment is susceptible of division, and I think should be divided and the two parts submitted separately.

I therefore ask that the amendment as it pertains to paragraph 1 of section 10 be submitted to the Senate for a vote first; and, if that is permissible, I will ask that the Secretary read that amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think the purpose which the Senator has in view by his amendment is amply taken care of in the present form of the bill. It is merely explanatory of what, in my opinion, is already in the bill. I do not know that it adds to or subtracts from it, but I do not think it is at all necessary. I think the object for which the Senator offers his amendment is already covered in the provisions of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question would be divisible if it were not for the fact that this is a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. STERLING. There are two propositions involved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. One is to strike out and the other is to insert. They are the two propositions. So you can divide to the extent of a motion to strike out and divide to the extent of a motion to insert. You can not otherwise divide it.

Mr. CUMMINS. There was so much confusion in the Chamber that I could not fully understand the proposal of the Senator from South Dakota in regard to the division of the amendment.

Mr. STERLING. The proposition was to divide the amendment and offer it separately. There are two paragraphs to section 10, and the amendment pertains to each of those paragraphs and the subject matter of each paragraph. My amendment inserted certain language in the first paragraph and substituted a new paragraph for the second paragraph of section 10, but the amendment was in the form of a motion to strike out and then insert a new section 10. The question is as to whether or not it is now divisible and if I can ask that the question be divided and that the language as proposed be inserted in the first paragraph.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe that the proposed amendment to the first paragraph has any effect whatever, although I would have no objection to it in order that it may be made entirely clear. It is clear to me as it is now. I desire to address the Senate very briefly on the second paragraph of the proposed amendment, if it is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule clearly settles the question. Rule 18 provides that if a question in debate contains several propositions any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided. The motion of the Senator from South Dakota is a motion to strike out and insert, and it is not divisible. The amendment is debatable, and it is amendable, of course.

Mr. STERLING. Then, to meet the emergency, if I may, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pending amendment, in order that I may offer an amendment to paragraph 1 of section 10.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is withdrawn, without objection.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. There was so much confusion I could not exactly understand the motion of the Senator from South Dakota.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has withdrawn his amendment for the present.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. All right.

Mr. STERLING. I now move to amend paragraph 1 of section 10 as follows:

After the word "law," in line 8, on page 11, insert the words "including the laws enacted or liabilities imposed under State authority for the regulation of common carriers of traffic wholly within the State."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As I said before, that, in my opinion, is simply explanatory of what is already in the bill. I have no objection to the language the Senator proposes, only I think it is superfluous. I do not think it changes the meaning of the present bill.

Mr. STERLING. Then, if the Senator will accept the amendment, I am satisfied that it will clear up what, I am sure, is at least an ambiguity in the bill. The question will be raised, and it will be one of great doubt, I think, as to whether or not State statutes regulating the common carriers of traffic within the States are to be included here in the word "statutes." I hope this amendment will prevail. If it was the intention of the committee that State statutes should still be in force, there can be no harm done and it will clear up the ambiguity.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to ask the Senator from South Dakota whether there is not danger that the amendment as he has worded it now will not introduce more ambiguity than is in the present bill. I am entirely in sympathy with his suggestion, and I assume that the bill meant, when it used the word "statutes," both Federal and State statutes. If we include, however, the State statutes relating to the regulation of rates without at the same time specifying the Federal statutes relating to rates, there might an interference arise that the Federal statutes relating to rates were not included. I suggest that instead of the language used the Senator insert the words "arising under Federal and State statutes."

Mr. STERLING. Very well; that will be quite satisfactory. I suggest that as a substitute for my amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. To that amendment I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 8, after the words "the common law," insert the words "arising under Federal and State statutes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to inquire what meaning the words "arising under statutes or at common law" have. If we are going to expressly legislate that they shall be under State and under Federal statutes, why do we have any words as to other statutes? Certainly they are not subject to foreign statutes. It seems to me that the bill is perfectly clear.

Mr. CUMMINS. My suggestion was in line 8, after the word "under" to insert the words "Federal or State statutes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 8, before the word "statutes" and after the word "under," insert "Federal or State," so that it will read:

Whether arising under Federal or State statutes or at common law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to strike out all of section 10 beginning with line 13, and insert——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out, on page 11, beginning with line 13, all of the bill down to and including line 2, on page 12, or the remainder of section 10, and in lieu insert:

That the Interstate Commerce Commission, in addition to the powers conferred by the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and acts amendatory thereof, is authorized to investigate, hear, and determine on application of the President and in the manner provided in said act, whether the rate or rates charged by any carrier or carriers under Federal control are, under the conditions, unjust or unreasonable or prejudicial to the public interest or to the purpose for which said control has been authorized and assumed, and on such hearing and determination to prescribe and order what rate or rates, charge or charges are, under the conditions, just and reasonable and which shall be observed as the maximum to be charged during such control.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, this is one of the very points the committee had before it, and after a very thorough debate and a pretty even division in the committee touching this rate making in the emergency, an agreement was reached which is embodied in the present bill and which will appeal to all those who have given study to the bill as being approximately the solution of the conditions that now confront us. The object and aim of this legislation is readily and easily without restriction to mobilize forces, and there must of necessity be given power to the Director General to keep commercial conditions as near as may be in their present status.

This is almost exactly an expression of the one side of that debate, while the opposite was to grant unlimited power over the rates. The committee decided that in an emergency where justice must be meted out the Director General should have the power to initiate rates, but if the rates that he names are burdensome the complainant could go before the Interstate Commerce Commission and have it adjudicated.

I hope the Senate will not accept this amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, pending a brief discussion of the amendment by the Senator from South Dakota, I ask unanimous consent to modify the provision in the bill so as to make clear the meaning of it by the insertion, after the word

"That," in line 13, of the words "during the period of Federal control," so that it will read:

That during the period of Federal control, whenever in his opinion—

And so forth.

That was the intention of the committee. It was not intended to give the President the power to initiate rates except during the period of Federal control.

As stated by the Senator from South Carolina, the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota relates to one of the very difficult controversies that arose in the committee concerning the provisions of the bill. It is easily conceivable that it may become necessary under the new order of things, under the rerouting and diversion of freight, to establish new rates, and to do that promptly the power to initiate rates under the bill is given to the President, with the right of review vested in the commission. That, as stated by the Senator from South Carolina, represents the best compromise after many days of deliberation that the committee could reach. It is not desirable to compel the President to apply to the commission for an order to change the rates, because the procedure of the commission is such that it would nullify the very purpose which the committee had in view in giving the President the power in certain instances to initiate rates. The proceedings before the commission are in the nature of judicial proceedings, and hearings are had, which would occasion great delay, and it would accomplish no good end to give the President the power to go before the commission to have rates instituted. The better plan, the committee found, was to give the President the power to initiate rates. That power undoubtedly would not be exercised save in exceptional cases and where the public interest seemed to the President to require it.

In any case, the commission is given the power to review the rate so initiated as to reasonableness and justice, and I respectfully suggest that is best, unless you want to adopt the idea which will, I understand, be presented by the Senator from Iowa, to give the commission exactly the same power that it now has over the rates. Unless you want to do that, I think it would be best to defeat the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is true that the majority of the committee accepted the provision now found in the bill. There are some members of the committee who were not prepared to accept it. I believe that the President ought to have the power to initiate rates precisely as carriers now initiate them. All the rates of the country are initiated by carriers, and during the period of Federal control the President, being in possession and operation of the property, ought to have the power that the carriers now have in that regard. I am speaking, of course, of the rate upon general commerce and not for the movement of Government property or troops.

My objection to the bill as it now is may be thus stated: At this time the carriers can initiate rates, but the commission have the power to suspend the rates until an investigation takes place respecting their reasonableness and justice. Now, carriers can not increase rates without the consent or approval of the commission, and my objection to the bill as it is lies in the effect of this amendment, which repeals the interstate-commerce law as far as the power of the commission to suspend proposed rates is concerned. It repeals the law which declares that rates shall not take effect if they are increased rates until approved by the commission. The bill as it is now furnishes no practical relief, because if the President can file a schedule of rates and put it into immedate effect and the commerce of the country must go forward for a period of 5, 6, 8, 10 months or more under the rates that are prescribed by the President, the review or appeal to the commission is of little practical value.

I have proposed an amendment which I shall offer presently and which retains on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission just the authority it has now with regard to rates upon general commerce and puts the President exactly in the position of the carrier, with power to initiate rates, of course, and after initiating them then it is for the commission to say whether they shall become effective or not.

The difficulty with the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota, in my judgment, is that it is qualified by the former part of the section, which gives the President the right to supersede by an order these laws and statutes and this jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Unless I am otherwise convinced, I am compelled to look upon the amendment as imperfect in that respect and not really as well calculated to do what the Senator from South Dakota has in his mind as is the bill in its present form.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in regard to the last statement made by the Senator from Iowa, I would like to say that I do not think his view is well taken. I remember having heard him mention the same matter before. The first part of section 10 is general; it refers to the orders which may be made by the President, and in effect provides that the orders made by the President shall supersede any conflicting Federal or State statute in regard to the matter of Federal control, but the second paragraph of section 10 relates to a special case, to the case of the initiation or fixing of rates. I think, under a familiar rule of consideration, that the special provisions would govern, and the President would not under my amendment initiate a rate in the first instance and without action by the commission.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I feel it my duty to make the suggestion to the Senator—I will not make the point of order now—but, with the leave of the Senator from South Dakota, I call his attention to the unanimous-consent agreement and to the fact that it only permits one speech from a Senator on the same amendment, and that the Senator has once spoken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota is speaking to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. On my amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; on the Senator's amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought that amendment had been agreed to by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina could not agree to the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well; I will withdraw the suggestion; but, Mr. President, the amendment that I proposed was accepted by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not; it has not been voted on at all. The Senator from South Carolina can not accept an amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, I asked unanimous consent for its consideration; otherwise it would not have been in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was in order. The motion was to strike out and insert, and the Senator from Arkansas knows as well as does the Chair that the part to be stricken out is first to be amended.

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, the Senator from Arkansas is unable and unwilling to express any opinion as to what the Chair knows, but the Senator from Arkansas asked unanimous consent, out of order, to present a verbal amendment. Of course, if the Chair makes an objection—the Senator from South Dakota made no objection——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota has not anything to do with it. The amendment is before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if I may be allowed——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is pending before the Senate, unless it is withdrawn by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then, I present the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the effect——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is before the Senate, unless the Senator from Arkansas withdraws it, and it is subject to five minutes' debate.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, as I understand, my amendment is the amendment now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to be informed——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota exhausted his time on his amendment; the Senator from Arkansas was right about that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no doubt about the Senator from South Dakota having exhausted his time on his amendment; but the pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, unless he withdraws it, which is to perfect the portion proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn, and the Senator from South Dakota has, therefore, exhausted his time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has mentioned a few words in the first part of section 10 of the bill which I think will attract the attention of all of us if we will consider them. The first part of the section reads:

SEC. 10. That carriers while under Federal control shall, in so far as is not inconsistent therewith, or with the provisions of this act, or any other act applicable to such Federal control, or with any order of the President, be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under Federal or State statutes.

Mr. President, should an order of the President set aside a statute? Surely, no one wishes the words "or with any order of the President" as a limitation upon the continued effectiveness of acts of Congress and acts of legislatures. We propose in this bill to modify the general law as far as we deem it proper to modify it; we are repealing the pooling statute; we are furnishing the machinery and the law under which we think this handling of the railroads should be managed; we are providing that the existing law, except as changed, shall remain in force, and that the rights of the people, the rights of the citizens, the rights of all shall be maintained, except as changed by ourselves, the lawmaking branch of this Government. Shall we put into the bill such a paragraph, an additional provision, that the change may be made by the order of an Executive? If I could combine in an Executive the wisdom of every man who has ever sat in that office, I would not disregard the constitutional responsibility of Congress by giving him the privilege of setting aside acts of Congress.

Surely, we will strike out that provision as soon as an opportunity can be made to move to strike it out. I believe there is a motion pending to amend by the Senator from South Dakota, but as soon as that has been disposed of I desire to move to strike from line 6 the words "or with any order of the President."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment: On page 11, line 13, after the word "That," to insert the words "during the period of Federal control," so that it will read:

That during the period of Federal control whenever, in his opinion, the public interest requires—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. ROBINSON. I make the point of order that the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota has been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from South Dakota has been defeated.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was not in the Chamber, and I understood that that amendment was still pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In line 6, page 11, after the word "control," I move to strike out the words "or with any order of the President."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. ROBINSON. I express the hope that this amendment will not be agreed to. The adoption of the amendment would be far-reaching; indeed, the effect of its adoption would be to retain in force all existing laws, and it would, in part, nullify Federal control. Under this amendment the order affecting demurrage would be invalid; under this amendment any order depriving the shipper of the right to route his freight would be invalid. I think to strike out this language would absolutely destroy the purpose of this bill. The purpose of providing Federal control is to make the executive authority in the operation of the roads paramount in certain instances, and if we provide that existing laws, both State and Federal, shall remain in force, I ask you what on earth could the President do that the railroads themselves could not do? The antipooling provision of the law would be kept in force; it would be impossible for the railroads under the statute to pool their earnings, and it would be impossible for the Director General to reroute freight or to do many other things which it is absolutely necessary for him to do if Federal control is to amount to anything.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator does not this bill give that privilege specifically?

Mr. ROBINSON. What privilege?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The privilege of rerouting freight and waiving the antipooling law?

Mr. ROBINSON. To what language in the bill does the Senator refer?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I asked the Senator the question because he is more familiar with the bill as a whole than I am, having participated actively in its preparation.

Mr. ROBINSON. It does not. I will state to the Senator from Georgia that there is no such language in the bill.

Mr. KNOX. It seems to me, Mr. President, that one of the things that has reconciled the public sentiment of the country to the assumption by the Government of the operation of the railroads has been the fact—and it has been set before the public by newspapers and by speakers upon this subject in both branches of Congress—that the President will be enabled, in the interest of efficiency, to do a great many things that the law prohibited the carriers themselves from doing. It seems to me that if this amendment prevails and the orders of the President as against existing practices, and to some extent as against existing law, are allowed to have no effect because of the striking out of the words "or with any order of the President," we might just as well not have taken over the railroads, but have left them in the management of those who have been trying to manage them during all the past years, and who were limited in their efficiency by statutes, rules, and orders which the President may temporarily suspend in order that the railroads may be operated to the best advantage.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it has been impossible for me to give this bill the careful consideration that it deserved, because my time has been taken elsewhere; but it seems to me, from the somewhat hasty examination I have been able to make, that the objections expressed by the last two Senators who have spoken are not well-founded.

The clause in section 10 which we are considering simply provides:

That carriers while under Federal control shall, in so far as is not inconsistent therewith—

That is, inconsistent with Federal control, which means all that the term implies, of course—or with the provisions of this act or any other act applicable to such Federal control—

Then follow the words—or with any order of the President, be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under statutes or at common law; and suits may be brought—

And so forth.

I may be in error, but, in my opinion, formed as it is somewhat hastily, all the provisions of this act which cover completely the question of general control, with all that control implies—the right to make rates, the right to make regulations, and so forth—will exist. All of the provisions of this act then will also apply, and all that it is proposed now to strike out is the provision that the orders of the President may set aside the substantive law of the country, and the law which is referred to is the law affecting liabilities as to common carriers, whether arising under statute or at common law. I think that it is to the words that I have just read that the broad provision which it has been moved to strike out applies.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. I yield, of course, although I have not much time.

Mr. ROBINSON. The language "all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under statutes or at common law" embraces the whole volume of both Federal and State laws affecting carriers. That is the very point. Government control would not accomplish anything if those laws are to remain in full force and effect.

Mr. REED. It would not limit the right to run these roads—to manage these roads—but the liability would exist. If we take the other construction, then the proposition is to give the President the right to nullify any law of Congress. We do not mean to do that, and I do not think the President asks for that. It is not intended to say, by the insertion of these words "or with any order of the President," that we intend to confer upon the President the broad right to set aside any law that Congress may have enacted.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a brief question?

Mr. REED. Yes; if I can have time to answer it.

Mr. KNOX. Suppose that the President should issue an order for the movement of a large body of troops in a way and under circumstances that would violate some law or some rule that now applies to interstate commerce?

Mr. REED. That is covered by the laws that are upon the statute books and is covered by this bill. I can not conceive of these particular words having any application to the general management of these properties. This provision relates to the rights of carriers—the rights of the people under the substantive laws of the country. If it is proposed broadly to give the President the right to set aside any law at any time he sees fit, then we are engaged in idle pastime here in passing a law and writing rules and regulations into it, because all that we would need to do would be to say that the President is hereby authorized to take over the railroads and to manage them for the benefit of the country. I have no doubt he would do it to the very best of his ability, and perhaps he would do it better than it will be done with any interference, but surely we do not mean to write the law in that form.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the query of the Senator from Pennsylvania is answered by the act of August 29, 1916, under which the President assumed control of these systems. That act recites:

The President in time of war is empowered through the Secretary of War to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation or any part thereof, and to utilize the same to the exclusion, as far as may be necessary, of all other traffic thereon for the transfer or transportation of troops, war material, and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable.

Of course this bill, if it becomes enacted into law, is supplementary to and not a repeal of the act of August 29, 1916.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the power given to the President is tremendous; but I simply want to remind the Senator from Georgia of the fact that if these words are stricken out the whole section will have to be rewritten. We have no law, either statute or common law, applicable to the Government operation of a railway system. None of the laws we have now relating to the regulation of these systems would be applicable at all.

Section 10 brought forward and made applicable the existing law which pertains to carriers operating property of this sort: and the committee sought to supersede or put over these laws the order of the President if it should become necessary. Now, I should like to see that authority limited; but it is perfectly apparent that if we should strike out the words "by order of the President" and allow the remaining part of the section to stand we would have a perfectly unworkable statute.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I am perfectly aware that the position taken by the Senator from Iowa is the correct one unless we then go to work and define in the bill just what powers shall be granted the President, just to what extent we do modify the law; and, as he intimates, it will be necessary to rewrite in this bill what modification of the laws we propose shall be put at his disposal. As a matter of course it is a tremendous grant of power, and that was one reason why the committee insisted that it should be limited to the war period; that these powers, so necessary for the proper prosecution of the war, we must of necessity grant and leave the responsibility for their wise execution upon those to whom we grant them. It is our duty in the premises to grant them. When we have done that we have discharged our obligation, and the obligation for the wise use of them rests upon those who, in the very nature of the case, are those responsible for their execution.

The statement of the Senator from Arkansas and the statement of the Senator from Iowa make it clear to me that unless we leave these words in the bill we might as well have no Federal control, so far as the objects and purposes for which the bill is written are concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why, Mr. President, the President is now operating the roads under the act of 1916. Everything is being done now that ought to be done under the act of 1916. Now, let us go a step further.

Section 8 provides:

That the President may execute any of the powers herein and heretofore granted him with relation to Federal control through such agencies as he may determine.

That absolutely preserves all the power needed by the President for their operation.

Again, section 9 declares:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed as modifying or restricting the powers heretofore conferred upon the President to take possession and assume control of any or all systems of transportation; and the President, in addition to the powers conferred by this act, shall have, and is hereby given, such other and further powers necessary or appropriate to give effect to the powers herein and heretofore conferred.

But the Senator from Arkansas says that he must pool the roads and that it is necessary by order to set aside the Sherman Antitrust Act. Why, when we authorize their operation by a single agency as one road they are already pooled. When we put them all together ourselves and authorize the President to operate them, or rather to have them operated, the pooling is complete. It requires no further legislation to accomplish it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not yield to the Senator. I have just a moment.

Now, let me go just one step further and see what the particular provision is to which I object.

When we come to section 10 it is declared:

That carriers while under Federal control shall, in so far as is not inconsistent therewith, or with the provisions of this act, or any other act applicable to such Federal control, be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under Federal or State statutes.

We have already suspended many of the State and Federal statutes by conferring power on the President to have the railroads operated as one system. We have waived all the Sherman Antitrust Acts by consolidating the property under a single management. We have the right to create priorities of shipments and to determine the routes without regard to direction of shippers. We have furnished the power. It is now being exercised. We redeclare the power formerly given as being vested in the President and those acting for him, and such incidental power, this bill says, as is necessary.

This particular section, section 10, has reference to certain rights of shippers and private citizens, and it declares that they shall remain, except as superseded by this and other acts of Congress. Shall we say they shall also be superseded by an order of the President? It is not necessary that we should do so to enable him to discharge the duties required by this bill; and I do not believe in declaring that any Executive can set aside legislative acts intended to guard the rights of the ordinary citizen.

I object to this provision in part because it may be used by employees away from Washington to annoy citizens, but I especially object to it because it is an abandonment of legislative responsibility.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, this illustrates the point which I suggested the other day, namely, that Senators who are discussing it have not understood the situation.

This provision was never intended, nor was it ever suggested before to my knowledge that the power in this paragraph was conferred upon the President to enable him to operate the railroads. If this bill is defeated, the operation of the railroads taken over by the President would not be affected. It was simply a provision to determine the liability of carriers under Federal control to suits and to determine what laws shall apply. This paragraph has nothing more to do with the operation of railroads under Federal control than the preamble of the Constitution. The power arbitrarily to control the railroads was conferred upon the President by the act of August, 1916. This bill is not intended to give the power of operation to the President, but to enable the people who have dealings or differences with the railroads to have them settled, and lawfully so. This is a railroad pay bill. That is what we intended it for.

Now, Senators insist that the power to operate the railroads by the President depends upon section 10. I called attention to this matter on day before yesterday, and have some amendments to offer to it if they could only receive consideration. This simply shows the confusion which comes out of this bill. This provision does not affect the Federal control of the railroads, but it does attempt to fix the legal status of the people of the country who have dealings with railroads under this changed condition. That is all that part of section 10 is for, although it is most imperfectly expressed. It ought to be changed. But this doubtfully expressed paragraph has been written into the bill and there it must remain. It ought to be clarified.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have only had time to examine this bill very casually; but it seems to me, on the face of it, that the powers to operate the railroads are conferred by the act of 1916, supplemented by this, and powers are given in section 9 in the largest possible way. It may be my own lack of acumen, but I can not see anything in section 10 except a provision to reserve to the American citizen—shipper or others—the right of suit which he now has under the laws, and, as the bill stands, that right to his day in court, to be set aside by an order of the President. I do not see how it could interfere with the running of a car or the routing of a train or anything.

Section 9 says that the President—shall have, and is hereby given, such other and further powers necessary or appropriate to give effect to the powers herein and heretofore conferred.

The largest kind of powers. All the ground on which the general-welfare clause of the Constitution was interpretated is in section 9. This is simply to protect the right of suit on the part of certain American citizens, and I do not think that right to a day in court ought to be taken away by an order.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. PITTMAN. I want to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts upon that point. Do I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts holds that a court should be allowed to restrain action under any order of the President in the control of these roads?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think there ought to be any power to deprive a man of his right to a day in court except by the statutes; and I think it is fully covered by the statute of 1916 and section 9 of this bill so as not to interfere with the powers of the President in the operation of the roads.

Mr. PITTMAN. Unless the powers of the President are absolute in the running of these roads his control would be worse than useless, it seems to me; and I believe if the existing laws covering the control of the roads are now superior to the order of the President in the premises a case could arise in which the courts would deny the authority of the President to make the order and restrain its operation.

Mr. LODGE. How is anyone going to get into court to sue the United States?

Mr. PITTMAN. Not necessarily to sue the United States, but they might enjoin an agency from the operation of the act.

Mr. LODGE. A United States agency? Enjoin the United States from running a railroad?

Mr. PITTMAN. If you give specific authority in this section to enjoin the United States agency, it could be done.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think this applies only to suits, as I have said; and I think it is one of those cases of running mad over this in the desire to give powers.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nevada to examine the language of section 10, to which I call attention? It is:

That carriers while under Federal control shall, in so far as is not inconsistent therewith, or with the provisions of this act, * * * be subject—

Now, I am paraphrasing from this point on:

be subject to liability under statutes or common law in suits brought against carriers.

Is not that the meaning? Has not the Senator overlooked the language "is not inconsistent with Federal control"?

I call his attention to the report of the committee. It reads:

Section 10 provides that so far as not inconsistent with Federal control each of the carriers shall remain subject to all laws and liabilities.

Mr. PITTMAN. What I am getting at, Mr. President, is this: Do the words "in so far as not inconsistent therewith"——

Mr. REED. With Federal control.

Mr. PITTMAN (continuing). Mean that it is consistent to restrain an order of the President of the United States?

Mr. REED. Oh, no. The President controls. We have Federal control. The President is the President. Now, just so far as is not inconsistent with that control, what? The carriers and the people can enforce the labilities which exist at common law or under the statutes arising out of their contracts with these companies; and I ask the Senator, who always wants to be right, to examine that statute and see if that is not the true construction of it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the matter that I have in mind is this: Undoubtedly there is no authority to sue the United States unless it is expressly given. Section 10 attempts to expressly give that authority. Now, then, if you are going to give an express authority to invoke the laws of the country against the United States, it should be definite; and I say that where you say "in so far as not inconsistent therewith" it is not definite. If you are going to give authority to the courts to entertain suits against the United States or restrain the United States, it should be definite, and I contend that you should have in there the words "or with any order of the President," because it is essential to the control given under this act that the President shall have authority to issue orders.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Federal control is not necessarily inconsistent with the right of the shipper to route his freight, is it?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then if existing laws remain in force the Federal Government could not reroute freight, because the law now gives the shipper the right to route the freight.

That is one illustration.

Under existing law, the equipment of one road could not be used on another against its will, could it?

Mr. PITTMAN. No.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then under Federal law, with the existing laws all remaining in force, the President could not remove the equipment of one road to another road where it was necessary.

That is another illustration, and dozens of them might be cited.

Mr. PITTMAN. The exception contained in section 10 is a reservation against suits and not against the power of the President.

Mr. President, I believe that both of those exceptions to the right to sue the United States or bring an action should be retained. It is absolutely essential that you except those things that are inconsistent with this act. It is also absolutely necessary that you except from the authority to sue the Government the power to hamper the President of the United States in his orders. Both of those clauses are essential to carrying out this act, and I take it that the purpose of the section is to grant the power of action against the United States Government, because the United States Government is running these roads under the bill. That power is wise, but it should be limited. It should be so limited as not to interfere with the operation of the roads, and if you are going so to limit it as not to interfere with the operation of the roads you have not only got to say that it shall not have any power or effect where inconsistent with the act, but you have got to go further and say it shall have no power or effect where it will interfere with the President of the United States in the operation of the roads under his order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of the amendment suggested by my colleague.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the Senator will pardon me. I have only five minutes and can not yield.

I am very much in favor of the amendment suggested by my colleague, and I do not think any Senator who clearly understood exactly what it seeks to accomplish could possibly oppose it. As suggested by the Senator from Nevada, it does not interfere and can not interfere in the slightest with the operation of these railroads by the President; but it does affect, and affect seriously, the civil rights of every person in the United States who has business relations with these carriers, whether those relations are the relations of shipper or of employee or whether they are contractual or arise from a tort.

We have labored in the two Houses of Congress for years to pass and perfect the employers' liability laws, for instance, changing the old common-law rule governing suits between the employer and the employee, and yet if this were passed, by a stroke of his pen the President of the United States could destroy those laws that we have built up through years of labor for the protection of the employees of railroads in their suits against the railroad companies. Now, there is no necessity whatever to do that. Certain laws of diligence and negligence relating to the obligation of carriers, both of freight and of passengers, are left absolutely in the air—all of them are left absolutely in the air and subject to Executive pleasure—if we leave in the bill these words that my colleague wants to strike out. In other words, we substitute for a government of laws a government not of men but of one man.

I am not willing myself to go on record in favor of the proposition that the President of the United States, while he is operating these railroads and while he stands in the stead of these railroads, in the place of these railroads, shall be allowed to abolish at any time the laws of contract, the laws governing torts, the laws governing the relations between shippers and carriers and between carriers and their employees; and I do not think that was the intention of the committee that reported this bill. That will be the unfortunate effect of it, however, if these words are not stricken out. I think we ought to leave the ordinary laws that have governed these carriers for years, while their property was in the hands of its owners, still in effect while the Government operates them, so far as those laws touch the citizen and his rights. No matter who operates these railroads, whether it is a government or a corporation or a number of corporations, the rights of the citizen, when they touch the persons controlling and operating these roads, ought to remain unaltered as they are now fixed by law. That, as I understand it, is the object of my colleague's motion, which I hope may prevail.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it seems to me that without these words in section 10 the effect of the section with those words stricken out would be that the carriers would continue absolutely subject to all laws and liabilities as comomn carriers, whether arising under Federal or State statutes or at common law. If they are subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under Federal or State statutes or at common law, then they are not under Federal control; you are absolutely robbing the statute of all of its virtues so far as the protection of the property against suits may be concerned.

This does not have reference to authorizing suits against the Government, but it authorizes suits against the carriers. It preserves the right to sue the carrier by any citizen who may have such a right and force it into court according to Federal law and according to statute and according to common law. It is only where Federal control would be destroyed by such a procedure and in such an instance as that, unless you give that power somewhere in the President, who stands in the place of the carrier when that right is invoked, unless you give the power in the President to prevent the taking out of his control absolutely the property of the carrier, you have not accomplished anything at all by your legislation. You can not preserve to the people who have dealings with the carrier, shippers, and passengers all the rights they have under Federal law and under State law and under common law against the carrier to proceed in the State courts or in any other way they may proceed and at the same time maintain your Federal control of the property, because the exercise of those rights now under the laws as they stand and without this statute might take the property absolutely out of the power and control of the Federal Government.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator understands that the law does not purport to repeal the act of 1916. Does not that act invest the President with ample power to operate the railways as may be essential to the prosecution of the war without regard to the provisions of this section?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am inclined to agree with the Senator that it would be better not to have the section in the bill at all, and to stand on the statute of 1916.

Mr. THOMAS. I think so, too, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. FLETCHER. But if you proceed to enact it and provide in this statute that this control shall be subject to common law, State law, Federal law, then you have nullified the act of 1916.

Mr. THOMAS. So far as it is not inconsistent with the Federal control.

Mr. FLETCHER. So far as it is not inconsistent with the Federal control. That is very indefinite and vague. I do not believe that the courts would be empowered to enforce such a provision as that. Then the semicolon following the word "law" leaves the provision rather unfortunate, it seems to me, if you propose to accomplish anything by this act. It goes on and says suits may be brought by and against carriers and judgment rendered as now provided by law, but unless it could be subject to the powers of the President to control these carriers in the operation of the road to act as common carriers you have not cured that defect. You must leave these words in the statute as it is or else you have not Federal control.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have been consulting with Senators who have taken part in this matter and I believe I can suggest an adjustment. Instead of striking out the words "or with any order of the President," I move to add the words "authorized by law," so that the phrase will read:

Or with any order of the President authorized by law.

That would permit to stand any order of the President which is authorized either by this act or by existing law. It seems to me that would meet the view expressed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator think that Congress has undertaken to define what orders the President may issue either in this act or the act of 1916? Does the Senator think it is possible to anticipate the orders which it will be necessary for the President to issue in the effective operation of the roads under Federal control? The amendment which the Senator from Nebraska has suggested, in my opinion, does not help the matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The President might issue orders which are not authorized by any existing law, either the act of 1916 or this act, and if he went beyond his power no Senator would maintain that those orders should be recognized.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And yet it is also evident that the orders of the President so long as they are based upon law, either this act or previous acts, should be allowed full recognition.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will permit me, the authority given by the act of 1916 and in this act given to the President is general. We have not undertaken to define what orders the President may issue, because it is impossible for Congress to anticipate what conditions will arise and what orders it will become necessary for him to issue.

If you put in the language "authorized by law," it will be necessary to write into this act the orders that you want to empower the President to issue, and he will have no authority to issue any order not expressly authorized by this act.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not see how the Senator can maintain anything of that sort. The President derives his power under acts of Congress. Congress does not specify precisely which orders he shall issue, but lays down the general control of these railroad properties for war purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The whole subject matter of railroad operation and railroad liability is controlled by existing laws—State and Federal. These laws are put into effect by this bill. Unless we do specifically authorize the President to issue certain orders he would have no power to issue any order of importance, because we make the laws that are already in existence, both State and Federal, effective, and they cover the field of railroad operations.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], in my opinion, was entirely correct in his statement that the insertion of this amendment would nullify the effect of Federal control.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska is a very wise one. Surely the Senator from Arkansas does not wish the President to issue orders not authorized by law and in violation of law.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator permit me to reply to that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I certainly do think it may be necessary to issue orders not expressly authorized by law, because you can not define what orders the President may find it necessary to issue.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; you can.

Mr. ROBINSON. When you authorize one, the expression of one would exclude the authority to issue other orders.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The expression that they are to be authorized by law excludes the idea that they shall be lawless orders.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me in that connection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It depends on whether this is in my time or some one else's time.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is certainly not in my time, because I have exhausted my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in the time of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am perfectly willing to yield. I have not anything further to say.

Mr. ROBINSON. I repeat the illustration that I used a while ago. Under existing Federal law there is no authority for rerouting freight. The law relating to the routing of freight by shippers would be put into effect by this statute unless you provide otherwise. It might be——.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I answer the Senator I do not agree with him at all. The consolidation of the railroads under a single management, in my judgment, eliminates any right to route freight.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield? I am still in the time of the Senator from Nebraska. We write here a provision that the existing laws shall govern and shall apply.

Mr. REED. So far as not inconsistent with Federal control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am inclined to concur in the views of the Senator from Massachusetts. I think section 10 should be retained in the bill, and I will state briefly my reasons.

The President will operate these railroads through the officials and employees and operating forces of the different railroads. Manifestly we do not intend that he shall create an operating force of his own. He will give direction to these roads to operate in such and such a manner. Manifestly he will direct them to operate in a legal manner, not to violate the rights of the public.

There are many instances where a railroad may be lawless in its operations. The President may direct the Northern Pacific Railroad to carry shipments of supplies from the Pacific coast over to the East, to the seaboard. That does not authorize the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to perform that work in a lawless manner. It does not authorize it to operate in such a manner as to destroy the life or property of anybody. In all those cases there ought to be a remedy and a relief left to the public.

All this amendment proposes to do is what it says in respect to matters not covered by the orders of the President, either under this law or the law of 1916. In all other respects the right of the public to relief and to a remedy shall continue to exist. Why should they not continue? We have given the President the power to operate these roads by this act, but it does not imply that the roads shall be operated in a lawless manner, and if they violate the rights of the public why should not the public have a right to a remedy in those cases? That is what this proposes to do. It proposes to save to the American public all their rights and remedies existing by law against the railroads so far as they do not interfere with the order and direction of the President. Take a passenger train. The President may give direction for a passenger train to operate from here to New York. That does not give the railroad company through which the operation is carried authority to operate it in a lawless manner. It does not give that train authority to run over a wagon or team in a careless and negligent manner. If they proceed to operate that train illegally then the company that operates it is liable, as it should be liable, to the public.

So, Mr. President, while this proposed law and the other law give the President all the power to operate these trains, whatever right the public may have under the general laws, if they are not in conflict with the President's power, is saved to the public. Why should we not reserve those rights to the public and leave the American citizen to obtain all the remedies possible under existing law? It simply amounts to this, Mr. President, that we say by this law that the rights of the American public shall not be suspended because of the powers we give the President under the law.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I think the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is unobjectionable. It does not take away any power from the President that he would use. Section 10 is an exception to this act. Without section 10 there is no authority whatever to invoke the law against any act under this bill or the act of 1916. In granting the power to interfere with the operation of this act by a court you should limit it. You limit it in the first place by stating "in so far as not inconsistent with this act." In other words, they can bring an action so long as it is not inconsistent with Government control.

Now, it is contended that that is broad enough, and it may be broad enough. Why not go further and say that they may invoke the aid of a court when not interfering with Government control and when not interfering with an order of the President in the control of those railroads authorized by law. Certainly there can be no objection to it. Certainly if you are going to prohibit these suits which are inconsistent with the act you will also prohibit these suits when inconsistent with an order of the President made under the act.

It may be contended that the first language covers it, but at least it emphasizes the fact that in section 10 we do not intend to allow suits to be instituted that will interfere with this Government control, and where you repeat the language in the form that these suits shall not be instituted in opposition to any order of the President made by authority of law you emphasize what you mean and at the same time do not grant the President any authority in addition to that which he has by virtue of this bill and by act of 1916. I will vote for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, but if it is lost I will vote against the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, which I believe will limit the President's authority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska if the amendment which he tenders is to be treated by him as having been tendered?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood that he formally tendered it. I can not accept it, because I have no authority to accept it. I move to strike out certain words. He proposes to amend those words, and that amendment would be acted upon before a motion to strike out. If the amendment is adopted I would be very much disposed to withdraw my motion to strike out.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let the Senator withdraw his amendment and then accept the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think I have any authority to accept the amendment. It is for the Senate alone to say whether it will amend the clause.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Senator withdraws his amendment, then the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska stands as simply an addition to the language in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It stands if the Senate adopts it. If I had the power to do it, I would put it right into the bill now and withdraw my amendment, but I have not the power. I move to strike out a particular clause. The Senator from Nebraska moves to amend that clause. Before the motion to strike out can be put, the motion to amend or perfect the clause must be acted upon, and the first question for consideration, therefore, will be, Shall the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska be adopted? which proposes to make the clause read:

Any order of the President authorized by law.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that that should satisfy every one, because unquestionably it carries the spirit of the act. It carries the power of the act. It carries the authority to the President to do, in my opinion, everything which the Senator from Arkansas insists that he should have the power to do, but it does not give him the power to go beyond the general purposes of the act and strike down the rights of shippers. I have no idea the President would wish to do so. I have no idea the Secretary of the Treasury would wish to do so. But, Mr. President, in the handling of railroads all over the United States special orders will be issued in the name of the President in particular localities just as the Food and Fuel Control Directors and their assistants have issued special orders in the name of the President under the powers we have given the President. It is the danger of the man in a locality interfering with the right of a citizen; it is that danger, incident to the use of the power given to the President by others than the President or the Secretary of the Treasury, that I feel should cause us to limit this language to orders of the President in pursuance of law.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I would just like to add one word in regard to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska. The words of the amendment conform to the other parts of the bill as otherwise expressed.

Let me call attention briefly to sections 8 and 9 and the reference in those two sections to the power conferred upon the President. Section 8 provides—

That the President may execute any of the powers herein and heretofore granted him with relation to Federal control through such agencies as he may determine, and may fix the reasonable compensation for the performance of services in connection therewith; and may utilize the personnel and facilities of the Interstate Commerce Commission and call upon members of such commission, or any of its employees, or employees of any department of the Government for such services as he may deem expedient. No such Federal official or employee shall receive any additional compensation for such services.

Now, look at the very general language in section 9:

SEC. 9. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as modifying or restricting the powers heretofore conferred upon the President to take possession and assume control of any or all systems of transportation; and the President, in addition to the powers conferred by this act, shall have, and is hereby given, such other and further powers necessary or appropriate to give effect to the powers herein and heretofore conferred. The provisions of this act shall also apply to any carriers to which Federal control may be hereafter extended.

I wonder why we should add unqualifiedly the words in section 10 "or with any order of the President," after he is given the power to make any orders to carry into effect any of the provisions of this act conferring upon him all these powers.

I am quite in sympathy with the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S name was called). I wish to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to serious illness in his family.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). Notwithstanding my general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], I have been voting thus far on the bill with the committee. I have heard from him to-day that that is his understanding in regard to his pair. I therefore at this time vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SIMMONS'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

Mr. ASHURST (when Mr. TRAMMELL'S name was called). The junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. If present he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I merely rise to announce the absence of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], occasioned by personal illness.

Mr. MYERS. On account of the state of health of my colleague [Mr. WALSH] he is still detained from attendance in the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the negative). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania

[Mr. PENROSE]. I thought he had voted a moment ago. I find he has not. I transfer my pair to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. FLETCHER. I inquire whether the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with that Senator. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE. My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is absent, and, as I stated yesterday, he has a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], but with the understanding that upon the bill and any amendments thereto either is privileged to vote in the absence of the other. Therefore I avail myself of the opportunity of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. KNOX (after having voted in the negative). When my name was called I voted "nay," neglecting to state that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], which I transfer to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER].

Mr. WOLCOTT (after having voted in the negative). I wish to inquire if the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have a general pair with that Senator. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays, 46, as follows:

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 6, after the word "control," it is proposed to strike out the words "or with any order of the President."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I move to strike out the first paragraph of section 10, referring to this subject, and to insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan offers an amendment to section 10, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the first paragraph of section 10, being all of the language embraced between lines 3 and 12, both inclusive, on page 11, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That during the period of Federal control any suit or proceeding (of such a character that but for Federal control it could be brought against the owner of any railroad or system of transportation and any amount paid in compromise thereof or in satisfaction of a judgment or decree therein charged to operating expenses or to railway tax accruals under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917), may, except as otherwise provided in this act, be instituted against the United States in any court or tribunal which would have jurisdiction of such suit or proceeding but for Federal control, and process therein may be served on the same persons and in the same manner as would be proper but for Federal control, and subsequent proceedings shall be the same as would be proper but for Federal control.

No process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property under Federal control, or, in connection with any suit or proceeding that may properly be brought against the United States under this section, against any property belonging to the owner of a railroad or system of transportation; but the President shall, by regulation, provide for the payment out of the operating revenue derived from Federal control or, if that is insufficient, out of the revolving fund of any judgments or awards, and for the enforcement of any decrees or orders that may be rendered against the United States in any such suit or proceeding.

That except as otherwise provided in this act the operating accounts and business shall be continued as in a going concern, so that operating accounts and claims, which have been deferred in the ordinary course of railroad business and which are not paid at the beginning of Federal control of a railroad or system of transportation and which are of a character properly chargeable to operating expenses, shall be paid out of operating income or out of the revolving fund; and on the surrender of such railroad or system of transportation it shall be returned subject to any operating accounts and claims that may be unpaid, if such accounts and claims have been deferred in the ordinary course of railroad business.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am only going to say a word. My understanding of this provision is that it is to take care of liabilities for suits, to make provision for them, and to provide what laws shall apply. There was no other object in mind when this matter was before the committee.

The provision which I have offered takes care of those cases. It will afterwards be determined whether the committee acts upon this measure or not, because it is bound to be a controverted question. Therefore I offer the amendment as a substitute, and I ask to have a vote upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan. [Putting the question.] The "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on that proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is detained from the Senate Chamber on account of serious illness in his family.

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I announce the same pair and its transfer as on the former vote and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I inquire if the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a pair with that Senator, but I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING. Repeating the announcement relative to my pair and its transfer which I made on the previous roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as I made before, I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I observe that he is absent. I transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] and will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 44, as follows:

So Mr. TOWNSEND's amendment was rejected.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the bill by striking out on page 10 all after the word "interest," in line 1, down to and including line 6.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, this bill, as I understand it, is proposed in order that the President may carry out more efficiently the Federal control of the railroads that has been assumed under the authority of the act passed in 1916. I have heard no discussion as to whether or not the act of taking control of these railroads was legal. My own opinion has been that the President did not take control of the railroads in accordance with the authority granted in that act or that might necessarily be implied from it. But the passage of this bill will of course authorize and ratify the taking of control and remedy any possible defect that may exist in that respect.

However, Mr. President, it seems to me that there is no necessity for the Government of the United States now, with the Treasury burdened as it has been and as it will be, buying and trafficking in securities of impecunious railroads. Generally speaking, those railroads which have extended their credit and used to a large extent are the ones that will be required to use it more, and the President is authorized by this bill to take the money of the people out of the Treasury and buy railroad stocks. Under the law as it exists the railroads have a right to continue their operations, borrowing money and making mortgages, and if the Government should buy bonds secured by a second or third mortgage, then we might as effectually be frozen out in foreclosure and the Government would lose its money just as surely as we have lost the money that we sent to establish a provisional government in Russia when we picked out the wrong faction.

It seems to me we ought not to go into that sort of business and that it ought not to be authorized. On that account I have presented this amendment. It does not interfere with the railroads going on with the sale of their securities; it only refuses to authorize the Government to deal in such securities.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. KIRBY. That is all I have to say about the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask whether the Senator construes the language in the first line, on page 10, as mandatory upon the President or discretionary?

Mr. KIRBY. The President may do what I have suggested; he is authorized to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But is it a discretion or is it a direction?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly it is within his discretion; we do not compel him to do it; but I do not think the power ought to be granted under which it could be done.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the junior Senator from Michigan?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Has the Senator considered, in looking over this provision to which the Senator from Minnesota and others in the Senate have given such care, what the President will do when he purchases the securities, how he would vote them, who would vote them, and how they would be represented in reference to the railroad? There is not a thing in the bill that makes any provision in that regard, but it is all left entirely blank.

Mr. KIRBY. This provision in effect authorizes the President to deal in stocks and other securities of impecunious and bankrupt railroads, and I do not think that ought to be done.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, it is a well-known fact that there are securities of railroads coming due in 1918 and in 1919—something like $400,000,000 in the next two years. It is a fact that it is impossible for the railroads to sell those securities on the market on a basis which the Government desires them to be sold when the Government is occupying the entire field with Government loans. The Secretary of the Treasury was very anxious that the power should be given to the Government to take any securities which might be necessary in order to render effective Government control, not to make it too expensive, and to relieve the conditions of the railroads.

Furthermore, it may be necessary for the President to authorize the extension of a road to some shipbuilding plant or other Government enterprise, and some one must finance the construction of such lines or the improvements necessary to make the Government operation effective.

This provision of the bill simply authorizes the President to take up each case and decide whether the Government out of the revolving fund shall temporarily take the securities of the railroads.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. KIRBY. Is it not a fact that under the authority granted the President can buy railroad securities out of any fund, without regard to the revolving fund?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; he will buy them out of the revolving fund.

Mr. KIRBY. That is the question I wanted to ask.

Mr. KELLOGG. He will buy them out of the revolving fund created for that purpose.

Mr. KIRBY. The bill provides that that fund may be used, but it does not necessarily limit the President to the use of that fund. He may buy them from other funds, and is authorized so to do.

Mr. KELLOGG. He has no other fund with which he could buy securities except the revolving fund which is created for that purpose.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the President could not use other funds without special authority.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly he could not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator used the word "temporarily." Is the bill so framed that the President can only make a temporary purchase?

Mr. KELLOGG. The object is to authorize the President to make temporary purchases during the period of Government operation, of course.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that; but there is nothing in the bill to that effect, is there?

Mr. KELLOGG. It is not intended by this bill to authorize the United States Government to go into the business of speculating in railroad securities.

Mr. OVERMAN. But he might buy all the securities owned by the railroads if he wanted to do so, might he not?

Mr. KELLOGG. But it is impossible with the $500,000,000 in the revolving fund to do anything of that kind.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand as to that; but the question in my mind is as to whether it is limited to the revolving fund and is merely temporary.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota will pardon me, it may come to be very permanent if the President is authorized to buy the securities and then has no power to sell them for less than he paid for them. If the market goes down a penny after he has acquired these securities, he has got them on his hands and under the law can not sell them.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota will yield to me again, my attention was attracted by his use of the word "temporarily," and I wanted to know if the bill is so framed that the authority granted would be temporary. I should like to see it made temporary. Of course the Government can only hold the railroads in control up to the expiration of 18 months following the proclamation of peace, but in the meantime he might purchase the securities and continue to hold them.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, it is not practicable to require the President to sell the securities he acquires under this provision within a definite time; he may not be able to sell them within a fixed time. It is absolutely necessary that the President should have some authority to finance extensions and to finance securities which are to fall due during the present year, for in no other way can we make Government operation effective.

So far as concerns any direction as to how the President shall vote stocks or what he shall do with bonds, it is impossible to meet all conditions which may happen by detailed specifications in this bill. I think it is absolutely necessary that the President should have this power.

Mr. OVERMAN. I also think he ought to have the power.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota, for whom I have great respect, whether he does not think it desirable to so qualify that clause that the President must dispose of these securities, even at a small loss, and thus rid the Government of its ownership of that kind of property? Suppose, for instance, he acquired securities of the New York Central Railroad at par and the market should drop to around 99½. Under this provision in the bill he could not sell a dollar's worth of the stock he had purchased at par. He ought to have that right. It would be perhaps less objectionable that he should be permitted to sell than that he should continue to hold them.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, so far as the Senator from Minnesota is concerned he is willing to give the discretion to the President to sell the securities he acquires at less than par, but we believed that the Congress would desire to limit the power of the President to do so.

It is not probable that the President is going to buy railroad stocks, but when a railroad needs money for the purchase of new cars or for extensions the President will undoubtedly make an arrangement for the issuance of bonds of the railroad secured upon its property, and the President will, if necessary, buy those bonds from the money in the revolving fund. Secretary McAdoo expressed his hope that the railroads would be able to sell some of their securities or refund some of their securities without the Government's assistance; but if that can not be done then it will become necessary that they should be financed to that extent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, my point is this, that I do not want the President or the Government to maintain stock values on the exchange at the price at which the securities were purchased in order that he may let go of the stocks of a railroad corporation. It does not look to me as though that were wise. If he can shake them off at a small loss, perhaps that would be more desirable than that he should continue to hold stock in private or semi-private corporations.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not prevail. It has occurred to everyone who has given any study to the subject that one of the very great difficulties which we have had in the past few months has been to sell railway securities. Many of them have fallen in value from 25 to perhaps 35 per cent.

A year or more ago, when it was found that it was necessary to add to the rolling stock of the companies, the railroads had very serious difficulty in getting the necessary funds. They did, I believe, succeed finally in making arrangements for the funds, but they were not able to have either engines or freight cars built. Now, if the railroads were not able to do their own financing when they had possession and control of the property how can we reasonably expect these same railroads to finance their properties when they do not have control or possession of them?

I recognize the fact that it is an unwise thing to have the Government unnecessarily go into the task of financing railroads, but we are doing many things now which we would not do in normal times; and if these securities are to mature from month to month and year to year, and the properties are not in the possession of the railroads, how can we expect them to raise the necessary money under war conditions? And is it not a wise thing to confer this discretionary power upon the Government to aid them?

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. KIRBY. Would it not be better to provide by law a postponement of the payment of these obligations, and let the Government pay the interest, rather than to unload the whole thing on the Government?

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President, that is a good way to depress the price of securities. Of course, we can provide a sort of a moratorium here, and we can prevent those who are the holders of these securities from collecting them; but is it a wise thing now to do it? We may have to do it later. At the present time all the surplus money of the country is going into subscriptions for Government bonds, for Red Cross funds, and for Young Men's Christian Association funds. The Government has preempted the money market; and now, having substantial control of that, knowing the vast amount of railway securities which are maturing, must we not, as a business proposition, aid in taking care of the responsibilities which now rest upon the companies?

The Senator from Minnesota has referred to the fact that there are about $200,000,000 of these securities maturing this year, $200,000,000 the next year, and, as my memory now serves me, more than $400,000,000 the third year. For this reason it does seem to me that it would be very unwise if we did not confer this power upon the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may the amendment be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The junior Senator from Arkansas proposes the following amendment:

On page 10, strike out the following words, beginning after the word "interest," in line 1:

> The President may purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities at prices not exceeding par, and may sell such securities whenever in his judgment it is desirable at prices not less than the cost thereof; any sums available from the revolving fund provided in section 6 may be used for such purchases.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think it would be very unwise to adopt this amendment. The chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. SIMMONS] yesterday reported to the Senate a bill authorizing a corporation to be organized under the provisions of the bill to make advances to railroads and all public-utility corporations. The $500,000,000 provided in this bill as a revolving fund is a mere bagatelle compared to what has to be advanced, not only to the railroads but to the business concerns of this country, in the next year.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KIRBY. Does not the Senator think that authority is granted by the provision that is proposed to be stricken out for the President to buy all the securities that he cares to buy, and obligate the Government to pay for them, whether this revolving fund is big enough to do it or not?

Mr. SMOOT. The revolving fund is not big enough to do it; and not only that, but the bill that I have referred to protects the Government or its corporation when advances are made on securities, not only to the railroads but from other public-utility corporations and to the banks of the country, including the savings banks of the country. That bill gives all the power that could possibly be asked on the part of the Government to finance all the institutions of the country.

I do not want to take the time of the Senate now to go into the details of the bill, but I want to say now that it will not be $500,000,000, but it will be billions of dollars, that will have to be advanced to the business interests of this country in order to carry them over during the duration of this war. The bill that was reported yesterday by the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] provides a maximum of $4,500,000,000, and specific arrangements are made for railroads in paragraph (d) of section 6 of the bill. We take care of them, as well as the other public utilities.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there are so many provisions in this bill which I can not reconcile with good legislation that my opinion with regard to any particular part of it must not be very highly regarded. Nevertheless, I am moved to say this with regard to the part of the bill that is sought to be stricken out:

If the Senate had adopted the amendment which I proposed relating to compensation this provision would not involve a great burden upon the Treasury, for the Government could have taken the surplus which, under my amendment, would be paid into the Treasury, and it would have been ample to care for the maturing obligations of these carriers, in my opinion. But the Senate chose to authorize giving to the railway companies a compensation that will put in their hands a surplus ample to do these things.

I do not think it possible, after paying to the railway companies this compensation that we propose, to avoid giving to the President the authority to buy railway securities. I would have been much better satisfied if the securities had been limited to bonds, and had not been extended to stocks; but that probably is not a very serious matter, as I can not conceive that the President will buy to any great extent the stocks of the railway companies.

For these reasons I find it impossible to support the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, it is not necessary for me to go further, except that I should like to say that I am of opinion that had the amendment of the Senator from Iowa prevailed, restricting the roads to the amount to which he would have restricted them, I think the Government would have had to buy all of these bonds. I think the persons who held them would have thought them practically worthless, and would have thrown them on the market, because they would have been so restricted.

But be that as it may, this provision was written into the bill to take care of the securities that it was ascertained were likely to come on the market during the time of Federal control, and to provide, in case their protection was necessary, for the Government to do it, in order that the immense financial requirements of the country for war purposes should not be embarrassed by these transportation securities being thrown on the market at the very time Government securities were to be thrown on the market. It was to take care of that condition that this provision was written in the bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What protection would the Government have if those bonds should decline still further after the Government purchased them?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The only protection the Government would have is the protection that all Government securities have—the power of the Government back of them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But if the Government bought the bonds at a certain price, and the bonds were to depreciate, the Government then would suffer the loss resulting in the depreciation of the bonds, would it not?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, no. The Government would still have the property.

Mr. VARDAMAN. And the loss would be pocketed by the people. But maybe that is of no special concern just now.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, if any loss should accrue, I do not anticipate that any great amount would be thrown on the market. It seems to me that under the provisions of this bill the very security that is guaranteed by this paragraph will take care of itself without this paragraph necessarily being invoked to take care of it.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. KIRBY. This provision does not lessen the guaranteed return of profits or dividends, does it?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No.

Mr. KIRBY. Then this is in addition. After the Government guarantees all the returns that the roads have been making heretofore, you authorize the Government then to buy these securities that may be offered.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Why, that is a part of the same principle. If we guarantee and maintain the stability of these securities in allowing them to make what they have made heretofore, then, if they come on the market, in order to carry out the same purpose of stabilizing the market, you must provide this or you absolutely nullify the very object for which you started out in securing this interest.

Mr. KIRBY. The Government pays the road a dividend for the operation of the road. Is not that true?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It allows the road to earn the same dividend that it has been earning; and it did that in order that the public might know that they would suffer no diminution in the value of the securities.

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Now, when the securities mature, if there is difficulty in financing them, we provide that they also shall be financed by the Government.

Mr. KIRBY. But if the Government pays for the operation of the road and operates the road, it gets all the service it has expected to get without buying the bonds; does it not?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But suppose the bonds mature?

Mr. KIRBY. It would not affect the operation of the road, if the Government paid for the operation of the road, would it?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It would affect the value of the bonds, if they were to be thrown on the market, and might also affect the sale of Government securities as well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

Mr. KENYON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

So Mr. KIRBY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 1 by adding thereto the following:

Provided further, That every railroad not owned, controlled, nor operated by another carrier company, and which has heretofore competed for traffic with a railroad, or railroads, of which the President has taken the possession, use, and control, shall be held and considered as within "Federal control," as herein defined, and shall be entitled to the benefit of all the provisions of this act.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is obvious that the amendment just read presents one of the exceedingly important questions which arise out of this legislation. We do not know what railroads have been taken over. As I remarked the other day, there has been, so far as we are informed, no definite or specific action on the part of the Director General in determining just what roads have been taken over.

There are in this country a great many small, independent, short-line roads. None of them are very prosperous. They have been built in order to give the communities which they serve such relief as competition with the trunk lines or systems may afford. They depend for their existence upon the activity and the vigilance of the officers or agents of the line in soliciting business. They could not exist at all in all probability if it were not for that part of the interstate-commerce law which gives to shippers the right to route the freight which they offer for transportation. That right has been taken away; that part of the law has been repealed; and the President or the Director General now assumes, as I think he may lawfully assume, the authority to divert traffic wherever it seems best for him to divert it.

I can not enter into the evidence which was laid before the committee at very great length and with absolute conclusiveness, but the consequence of taking over the trunk lines, competitors of the short lines, will be to destroy them. They have already suffered such embarrassment that bankruptcy stares them in the face.

We are proposing to finance the railroads which have been taken over, and you can imagine what opportunity the short-line independent roads will have to finance themselves or aid or better themselves in any way when every market for their securities will have been foreclosed through Government competition.

Now, we have taken over these railroads upon the assumption that we ought to unify the transportation systems of the United States. We have taken them over upon the assumption that the old laws of competition are no longer to be regarded—that is, during the war. We are entering on an effort to consolidate the energies of all railroads, so that they can be used with the utmost competency as a whole, and yet the short lines are not to be taken over, because we were advised in the hearings that many of them would not be taken over, although it was impossible to tell just which of them would be taken over and which would not, but we were left under the impression, and I think a fair impression, that a very few of them would be taken over.

Mr. President, if we undertake the operation of these great lines without giving the short-line independent roads—competitive roads—the benefits of this bill we will drive all of them into insolvency, and when the period of Federal control shall have passed the great railroads of this country will be able to absorb the small ones at whatever cost it may deem wise for the great lines to give the smaller ones.

I hope that the amendment to the amendment may prevail.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, this matter was gone into pretty thoroughly in the committee. I think the Senate should know that when the proponents of the bill, the representatives of the administration, first came before us the question was asked, "What part of the railroad system of this country would be taken over?" The reply was that it was understood that all the roads, possibly going so far as little private logging roads, might under the terms of the bill be considered as a part of the system.

Be that as it may, the object and purpose of the bill is that the Government of this country shall avail itself of the transportation facilities. These roads have been built up under the competitive system. As the Senator from Iowa says, they are independent; they are competitive. It is needless for me to offer an illustration to show that that is true. In common justice, in fairness to the carriers of this country, and to the people whom the carriers serve, I think the roads that the Senator describes should be incorporated in the bill.

You can not calculate the value of a road by the amount of money that is invested in it. You can not calculate the value of a road by the earnings it makes. The only way you can calculate the benefit of the railroads to the people to-day is from a comparison with other means of transportation and communication. I had a little experience that gave me a keen appreciation of the value of railroads when I rode 30 miles on a train to reach a certain point, which point was 15 miles away from any railroad station. I paid a little less than a dollar. I went 30 miles. I saved money. I saved time. I was as fresh when I got off the train as when I got on it. I paid $5 for a private conveyance to take me, in two hours, over the 15 miles that I had to go by private conveyance.

I use that as an illustration to show that the people of the community in the transportation of their goods are entitled to the same fair consideration as those who are contiguous to the great trunk lines bear to the points at which the smaller lines converge and which would not exist were it not for the small lines.

I think the road described by the Senator from Iowa ought to be incorporated in this bill and be taken care of for the benefit of the public.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be adopted. The State of North Carolina is known to be quite a manufacturing State. There are many little manufacturing towns which were discriminated against by exorbitant freight charges and relief could not be had from the Interstate Commerce Commission.

On the eastern side of my State is the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, a great trunk line, running through the entire State; on the west and in the Piedmont section of the State is the Southern Railroad; and in the central part of the State is the Seaboard Air Line Railroad. The people took the matter in their own hands and built from 20 to 30 short-line railroads, connecting these little towns with the Atlantic Coast Line, the Southern, and the Seaboard Air Line so that they could secure competitive rates.

North Carolina has been discriminated against because it was in a classification district south of Virginia and the State suffered from exorbitant rates. These little short-line railroads have given lower rates. It is the only way they can get them. They could not get it through the commission. By this means our people have been able to get cheaper rates and have built up wonderful little towns, manufacturing towns, and made our State prosperous and rich.

Giving the power to change the routing, and give these roads no freight, bankruptcy will be the result, and there no longer will be any short-line roads. Competitive lines and the people will be in the hands of the great trunk lines and will be robbed by higher freight rates. They will all be bankrupt. In my State one railroad was built by a half dozen men who advanced the money themselves. They put in all the money and built a railroad for the purpose of getting cheaper rates. If you do not take over these short-line railroads, they will be bankrupt by act of their own Government, and I am sure the Government does not want to bankrupt these small lines.

I think it is the duty of the Senate to adopt this amendment. In fact in the House of Representatives the committee itself has adopted an amendment which probably does not go as far as this, but an amendment which I think will pass the House.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina a question?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Or, rather, may I be permitted to make a suggestion to the Senator? If the Government takes over these roads in order to save the roads, is there not a likelihood of bankrupting the Government? I am more interested in protecting the interests of the Government than I am in looking after the private pecuniary welfare of the railroads.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all, Mr. President; if we route the freight over roads like the trunk lines have been doing the roads will make money, as they have been doing.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I thought this bill was for the purpose of taking over the railroads to enable the President to successfully conduct this war and carry the commerce of the Nation. I had no idea anyone had in mind that it was done with a view of promoting the interest of a private enterprise or protecting private property.

Mr. OVERMAN. Nor destroy it, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] suggests to me. It is not intended that the Government should destroy this property that the people have built up.

Mr. THOMAS. It is trying to destroy the oil locations of our citizens, and I am afraid it may succeed.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I wish to say but a word in support of this proposition. There is no one who is going to vote on this bill who doubts, or not many at least who doubt, but what the real reason back of this legislation is the financial situation in which these railroads will find themselves on account of the condition of the money market and the Government necessity to float loans. That being true in spite of the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], and he seems to be the only man who is doubtful on the point—that being true, I want to ask the Senate if it is fair and just to extend this financial help for a limited period to all great and rich and powerful railroads and deny it to the weak and small and the poorer railroad. If the Pennsylvania System, for instance, or the Great Northern, or the Northern Pacific, or the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul could not get money in the condition of the money market that we expect the money market to be in it is practically certain that these smaller lines could not. You leave them to inevitable ruin, you send them to their death unless you do this thing, because none of the other remedies that might be adopted to relieve the railroads, of course, will be adopted if this plan of Government operation for a limited period prevails, as it seems likely to prevail.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the object in taking over the roads had been primarily that of protecting the securities, would it not have been a much simpler proceeding to have passed an act for the protection of the securities instead of taking over the roads and operating them?

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly, and that is what I urge the Senate to do, and that is the reason why I am not going to vote for the bill no matter how you fix it, because it could have been done in a much simpler and easier way, and it could yet be done in a much easier and simpler way.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HARDWICK. I can not yield to the Senator under the five-minute rule. We are not going to do that if we adopt this other plan, and I do not think any Senator seriously doubts but that the financial consideration is the principal consideration moving us in this matter. That being true, is the rain to fall on the great and small alike? Are we to help the powerful system of trunk lines and deny that same help to smaller and weaker and poorer lines? That is the question presented by this amendment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator has announced his determination to vote against this bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Without charging the Senator with an improper motive in this matter, for I know he is incapable of such a thing, it occurs to me, since he has announced his unalterable opposition to the bill, that he is trying to make it as unpalatable for the balance of us as possible by this amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator knows better than that. That is not a fair suggestion. The Senator from Georgia, although opposed to this bill, is voting on these amendments according to the merits of each one of them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator understands that what I said was only in a spirit of jest. I am sure my friend, the able Senator, never had a sordid motive in the performance of his official duties.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator ought not to make suggestions of that sort, even in jest. I am voting upon these amendments squarely on their merits, and if the Senator from Mississippi is voting on the Utopian idea that he is really not helping pull the railroad chestnuts out of the fire, I think there is a day of awakening coming to him.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield, if I have any time.

Mr. CUMMINS. It simply brings these roads within the operations of the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. It treats them like the others.

Mr. CUMMINS. The President is empowered to make just what agreement he can make respecting the compensation which is to be paid for their use.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. To the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia that the purpose of the bill is to take care of the railroads, of course I can not agree.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understood the Senator to dissent from that, and I was wondering whether anyone else in the Senate dissented from it or not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is astonishing to me that the Senator should make a statement which, it seems to me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Georgia is up.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, is my time up?

The VICE PRESIDENT. You have not started yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. VARDAMAN. Then I will start. [Laughter.]

I realize that the taking over by the Government of the railroads will incidentally yield to them large profits, profits greater than they would enjoy if they remained the masters of themselves. But it certainly was not the primary purpose of taking the railroads over. My understanding, though it may be Utopian in the estimation of some—it is common honesty in my judgment—is that the railroads were taken over for the purpose of improving transportation facilities, to enable the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army, to move men, material, munitions of war, and otherwise improve the commerce of the country, for the purpose of carrying on to a successful issue this war. It is simply and purely a war measure. To my way of thinking it is a lamentable fact that railroads will profit largely by the assumption of control of them by the President. It is one of the hardships the people must bear in this emergency, I might add, however regretfully, with the permission of Congress. I have voted to limit these profits, and I shall continue to support any measure that may be introduced that will hold down the profits to the level of just compensation. I think to secure the railroads normal profits in these abnormal times, while other branches of trade and business people are making sacrifices, borders on to disloyalty to the great masses of the people who fight the battles of the Nation, and whose toil produces the food and material that clothes and feeds the world. I repeat, Mr. President, that it can not be the primary purpose of this measure to benefit the railroads. To use a public function such as this bill creates to promote the interest of a private corporation would be disloyalty to this Government.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course the Senator states his own purpose, but——

I think there are a great many other purposes the Senator is not acquainted with that may be moving.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That may be very true.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the Senator himself can not deny, whatever the purpose, that that is one of the primary objects of the bill anyhow.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the statement as to the object of the bill, but does not the Senator know it is just as necessary to mobilize the life and strength of the food producers of the country as the ammunition makers? Does not the Senator know it is just as necessary to maintain these roads in their full operation in order that we may produce as much as possible as it is to make guns or to make powder?

Mr. VARDAMAN. That may be true, Mr. President, but we must indulge in the presumption that the President, the Commander in Chief of the Army, has thoroughly canvassed all of these questions and reached the conclusion, after consultation with those in authority about him, that the short-line railroads should not be taken over. We must depend upon the President's judgment in this emergency as well as leave many matters to his discretion. I am not of those who believe him inerrant, but I think he is a man of extraordinary learning, great determination, and as he is the constitutional head of the Army we must leave some things to him to do which we can not do as the Congress. I am in no way antagonistic to the interests of short lines of railroads and I regret the straits in which conditions place them. If they are needed in conducting this war, they ought to be taken over, and doubtless will be. But up to this time the President has not done so. He evidently deems it unnecessary. But aside from all that, Mr. President, I want to say that if the purpose of this amendment is to take care of the financial interests of short lines of railroads rather than to serve the public, of course I can not subscribe to such a theory. It seems to me indefensible.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, of course I think the Senate understands that if this amendment is adopted it will compel the taking over of all short-line roads. It speaks of roads competing for traffic. I would have liked the amendment very much better if it read the President is hereby compelled to take over all short lines. As this is phrased, it will be very difficult to find a short line anywhere that does not compete to some extent with some other line, and therefore it could be taken over, and would have to be taken over, under the proposed amendment.

Senators have attempted to distinguish here between great systems and small lines. It is a favorite method of argument sometimes with some people to try to distinguish between the great and the small for the purpose of casting reflection upon a bill that may be up for consideration before the Senate. Under the bill as it is framed the great systems and the small lines are treated alike. There is no distinction. The proposed amendment makes favorites of the small or short lines, and requires them to be taken over, but it does not require the taking over of the larger lines.

I recognize the part that the small lines play in our civilization, and I want to see them cared for when they are deserving. But let me illustrate what this amendment means. A distinguished lawyer from the State of Georgia came before the committee, who was insisting that all these lines should be taken over. I put the question to him if a road had an interest-accruing account of $500,000 annually, and it was earning only $250,000 to apply on interest account, would you want the Government to take over that road and pay the whole amount of the interest? Why, certainly, he said, because if the Government did not do that the road would go into the hands of a receiver.

I want Senators to bear in mind, when they are voting upon this question, that it means upon the Government is placed the burden of taking over every bankrupt road in the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. It means that every company that has two streaks of rust and bales of bonds outstanding must be taken over. The committee bill leaves it to the discretion of the President to say what lines shall be taken over, and I am willing to trust the welfare of the deserving small roads to the President, as well as the welfare of the great ones. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask the Senator this question. We are also leaving to the President the authority to agree upon compensation. He need not agree with these roads for a compensation too great, and if they are two streaks of rust and serve no useful purpose their compensation would then be very nominal.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator has very intense feelings upon this subject. I have not designated all these short roads, as the Senator would indicate by his statement. I have distinguished between the deserving and the undeserving. It is for that reason that I shall vote against this amendment, at the same time believing and hoping that the most of these short lines will be taken care of by the Government. But I do not propose by my vote to tell the President to take over some roads that have been promoted by some people who know more about getting money from the public than they do about operating railroads.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I certainly would not stand before the Senate and ask the Government of the United States to protect any railroad that was not more than paying expenses to-day. The reason why I am in favor of this amendment is because the short-line railroads of the United States are on a paying basis to-day. The short-line railroads of the United States are the ones that are reaching out into all parts of the country, and are the means of developing new homes and building up new towns and cities. The short-line railroads of to-day are financed largely by local money, and if not interfered with will have no trouble in the future. The Government now steps in and monopolizes the money market. Its requirement closes the money market to borrowers and prevents the short-line railroad from securing additional money for extensions—which I have no objection to at all, for in a time of war I believe that ought to be done, and if the financial bill that was reported yesterday is passed it will be done—but prevents the refunding of the roads' standing bond obligations.

I know of one short-line railroad whose bonds will fall due on the 1st day of April of this year. Most of those bonds are held by local people, and the holders of the bonds have notified the railroad people that they do not know whether they dare carry the bonds longer. The bonds are falling due. The roads will have to refund them or fail. The present holders do not know whether they dare invest their money in such bonds again, for the reason that there is power in the hands of one man in the United States to say that there shall not be one pound of freight carried over the road that enters into interstate commerce. This could be done; and the man who has invested his money in the bonds to build the road and who has seen the road grow and actually become a financial success, under the power that is granted in this bill will not know whether the limit of that power will be exercised or not.

I do not expect Secretary McAdoo, the Director of Railroads, to issue an order of that kind against any road in the United States; I know he has no such motive in view; but we do not know what circumstances are going to arise, nor does the holder of the bonds know what is going to happen, so he more than likely will refuse to buy the bonds.

Therefore, Mr. President, it does seem to me that if we are going to protect railroads at all we ought to protect the ones that need it for their existence as much or more than the great systems of roads in the United States. The short-line roads have been feeders for the larger roads. They haul freight in many cases direct from the farm and delivered it in carloads or less than carloads to the main trunk line.

I want to say, Mr. President, if conditions are to remain just as they are to-day, and these short-line railroads are not recognized, when the bonds fall due they can not refund them under the conditions of the money market, and they will be in the hands of a receiver; and what will be the result? When in the hands of a receiver and a forced sale is the result, we will find the short lines controlled by the larger railroads of the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment as I understand it, but I should like to ask the author of it a question. I wish to know whether or not this amendment, if adopted, would require the Director General to take over the New Orleans Belt Line Railroad? That is a road which serves every railroad entering the city of New Orleans. It has about 70 miles, with main trunk and sidings, and I do not understand that it operates with any other road, but it is a public utility for the use of the roads entering the city. I simply wish to know whether the Government would be compelled under the terms of this agreement to take it over and handle it as it is now handling other roads in the country?

Mr. CUMMINS. The utility referred to by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] very clearly would not come within the amendment which I have proposed any more than a terminal company would come within the amendment. The word "competitive" was used for a purpose, and if the public-utility company did not compete for traffic with other trunk lines that were taken possession of by the President, it would not be within the operation of the amendment.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, that is the way I understood it, and I am glad to have that explanation from the Senator, because I should very much dislike to have that big public utility there taken over. It is doing for that community exactly what the Director General is trying to do for the railroads of the United States. It is unifying all the roads so that when we get their service they all serve on terms of absolute equality.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, it seems to me that this amendment should not be favorably considered. If the purpose in taking over the railroads was to benefit the Government, and not for the benefit of the railroads, we ought to limit the right to take them over to such roads as are necessary to serve the purposes of the Government—to transport the soldiers, the munitions, the equipment, and the supplies of the Government which are necessary to be transported. That is all the service we ought to be required to pay for in taking over these roads in the first instance, it seems to me.

We have agreed upon this method of compensation for the roads taken over and now, since it is necessary only to use certain trunk lines and certain short lines together, in order to carry out the Government purpose, that is as far as we ought to go. It seems to me that we ought to stand by and help to protect the Government here, rather than to go further, and spread out, to protect the railroads at the expense of the Government. If it were a question of owning the railroads, of the Government taking over and operating the railroads to subserve the public convenience and to protect the public against extortionate charges and rates, it might be well to consider this other matter proposed by the amendment; but it seems to me that it ought not to be done now. Let the President take over only such roads as are necessary for this war purpose; and let us pay whatever ought to be paid for that service, and no more. It is time we came to the rescue of the Government, it seems to me; and I do not think this amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I realize that something can be said on both sides of this question. I merely wish to state my position upon it. I am not willing to vote to compel the President to take over practically every line of road in the country. I believe that nearly every road in the country will come under the description of "competitive roads" and will be taken over, and that the Director General or the President will have to make an agreement with each one or they will be remitted to court to sue the Government for reasonable compensation. While some injury may be done to some lines of road, I am not yet ready to vote to give every one of them a right to go into court to sue the Government for compensation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I very much hope that this amendment will be adopted on two grounds: First, on the ground that these independent short-line roads are important to the Government. Many of these railroads are very necessary to the Government. For instance, a great many of them are coal roads, running for a short distance into coal territory, and surely nothing is more important to the Government than is a bountiful supply of coal, as we all know. We ought not to take any position about this matter which does not provide that short-line roads running into coal territory, for instance, shall be utilized by the Government. Our recent experience about coal indicates that it is absolutely necessary for the Government to have every coal-using railroad in the country, whether it is a long-line or a short-line road, whether it is a great trunk line or an independent short line.

In the next place, this amendment ought to be agreed to because it is absolutely fair. As reasonable men, as men of business, we all know that unless some arrangement is made to finance these short-line roads, after this bill has passed they can not meet their obligations or maintain their credit, and they will go into the hands of receivers. I think that would be bad for the whole country. I think it would not only be bad for the roads themselves—unjust and unfair to these short-line roads—but it would be unfair to the public and to the Government. It ought not to be countenanced. I believe that this amendment ought to be adopted, and I am going to vote for it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if it is not a fact that under the finance bill, which is to be reported to the Senate I understand very soon, the Government may aid the financing of any institution in this country when it is necessary to do so?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, of course, under some other bill we might provide for that; we might provide for a great many things in the future. But what we are doing now is providing for the passage of a fair and just and effective railroad bill. The amendment is pertinent to this very bill, and the question ought to be decided at the same time that we decide the questions arising about the other great lines of railroad. We ought to take care of the Government in using short-line competitive railroads necessary to the Government, just as we do in using the great railroad systems of the country. It may be too late to save these short lines from bankruptcy if we delay. They may all be put in the hands of receivers and then gobbled up by the great Government-favored systems if we do not provide for them now. We should be as fair to the small ones as we are to the great ones. I sincerely hope that the amendment will be adopted now and that it will not be put off until some future time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, as has been said by one Senator, practically all of these short-line roads have been paying properties. The fact that they have been paying properties has grown out of two circumstances: One, under the competitive system under which they were built, the right of every shipper to route his freight; secondly, the traffic arrangements between these short lines and the through lines which they serve and with which they connect.

If we take away from them the routing privilege and take away from them the traffic arrangements which they have made—and they would never have been built unless they could have made such arrangements—then we shall leave those roads absolutely helpless. It is not a matter of speculation or theory; it is a matter of absolute certainty that everyone of them must cease to be a profit-earning property.

Talk about their ability to borrow money under those conditions. Why, Mr. President, neither under the Federal reserve act nor under the war finance-corporation bill—which has been reported, and not to be reported, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] said—under neither one of those bills could these roads borrow a dollar, because the depreciation of their securities would be so great that it would be impossible for them to give the requisite security to meet their maturities on the advances they would under these conditions have to borrow, if they are to remain and continue as going concerns.

What will be the result of those conditions? Inevitably those roads, which are worth to-day over $1,000,000,000, will go into the hands of receivers and become utterly worthless properties.

Mr. President, of course, the purpose of this is to help the Government in the prosecution of the war; but in all of our legislation with the same end in view we have not been unmindful of the private interests which would be affected by the legislation. When we fixed the price of wheat we were not unmindful of the interests of the wheat growers of the country; and when we come to pass this legislation we ought not to be unmindful of the interest of the owners of these short lines. It is not alone the interest of the stockholders in these roads and the holders of securities in these roads that will be disastrously affected by their exclusion from the provisions of this bill. The people of many communities—agricultural communities, towns, and cities—will also be disastrously affected. Most of these roads were, in the first instance, built through a sparsely settled section of country; they develop these communities.

Along these roads thriving and prosperous towns and cities spring into being, agriculture has been stimulated and developed.

There are short roads in my State, upon the line of which prosperous towns of three, four, and five thousand people have in recent years sprung up, dependent upon them for transportation facilities. Destroy such roads and you destroy the means of transportation facilities of those people; you destroy these towns and cities, and you handicap and weaken the agriculture of the entire section they traverse.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the taking over of these roads will impose any serious burden, if any burden whatsoever, upon the Government. In the first place, if the Government shall take over these short roads and if it will let them continue the present privilege of routing their freight and will continue the traffic arrangements they now have with the through lines taken over by it with which they connect, they will continue upon a profit-earning basis in the future as in the past. The Government need not lose a cent, and the communities through which they now go will continue to enjoy the same benefits of transportation that they now have, and these great property interests will be protected and preserved.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to remind the Senator that he cut down the price of wheat instead of raising it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but we fixed a price for wheat that makes it profitable for every man in this country to raise wheat.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not by any means.

Mr. SIMMONS. The price is twice as much as before the war in Europe.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that the farmers were getting more for their wheat at the very time the President fixed the price than they have since received.

Mr. SIMMONS. But that was the result of the war. They never got such a price for wheat before the war. We fixed the price at $2.20 a bushel, and before the war I do not remember in all my life to have heard of wheat selling for $2.20.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think all this talk about the price of products at this time is somewhat irrelevant. Cotton is selling at 30 cents a pound, which is about three times its normal price. Wheat is selling at $2.20, which is about 120 per cent beyond its normal price. I do not see that we have anything to do with that. The demand and supply of the market have controlled the price of both products, just as they have controlled the price of barley and flax and wool and hundreds of other commodities. By the way, every attempt of the United States Government to interfere with prices in the markets is futile. Whenever you fix a price by governmental regulation you do one of two things: You either fix that as a minimum price while you are fixing it as a maximum and you enable the producer to speculate upon the consumer, or, upon the other hand, your action is ineffectual, and if it is ineffectual you leave it to the ordinary speculative market to control the price.

The world has been full ever since the beginning of time of examples of governmental attempts to regulate prices. No governmental attempt to regulate prices has ever been successful; no governmental attempt of that sort ever will be successful. When you say to a man, "You have a right to charge $2.20 for a bushel of wheat," that gives him a right to speculate up to the extent of $2.20, and if he can find in the market somebody interested in reducing the price of wheat it will be reduced; and that is the end of that proposition. If you were to attempt to fix the price of cotton, for example, at 30 cents, its present price—an exorbitant price for all of us, as we recognize—you could not do that. The price might be fixed, but it would be fixed independently of you and independently of any legislative commandment of the United States Government. It is fixed inexorably by supply and demand.

There are about a million and a quarter bales of cotton going up every year in explosives. What is left is nothing. In the old times when a million and a quarter bales of cotton were used there was something left in the shape of old clothes; you could send them somewhere and have them converted into rags, if you could not do anything more; but there was something left.

There is nothing left of this million and a quarter bales. All the linters are going up, and about half a million bales of cotton besides the linters are going up every year.

Mr. President, all this attempt on the part of the Government, here or elsewhere, to control prices hits itself upon the rocks of psychology. You can tell a man what he can sell a thing at but you can not tell the man to sell it; and if he does not want to sell it, he will not sell it. You can tell a man what to buy a thing at but you can not make him buy it.

I have stood here and I have voted for bill after bill providing for the fixing by the Government of all sorts of prices, and I did so because I did not want anybody to suspect that, even remotely, with my boys and sons-in-law and my nephews in the Army, I could object to anything that the administration wanted to carry on the war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am very sorry; I have just begun. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. On the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I am not certain how he would vote if present, although his colleague [Mr. KNOX] has voted "yea" and perhaps he might vote "yea." I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER. I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, and vote "yea."

Mr. BECKHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. BECKHAM. Then I transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness in his family.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on previous votes, I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 58, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—58.

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I move, on line 3, page 14, to strike out the word "eighteen" and insert "six." I have no desire to discuss the amendment. I think the Senate understands it perfectly well, but I should like to have the yeas and nays on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, section 13, line 3, before the word "months," it is proposed to strike out "eighteen" and to insert "six," so as to read:

SEC. 13 That the Federal control of railroads and transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall not continue longer than six months after the proclamation of peace terminating the war in which the United States is now engaged.

Mr. LODGE. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask to have the amendment again stated. I am not sure that I caught its full purport.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment of Mr. LODGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I express the hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts will not be agreed to. This feature of the bill was the subject matter of prolonged discussion on yesterday, and it is not my purpose to repeat in detail the arguments that I then attempted to make justifying the limitation of 18 months placed in the bill by the committee. I do, however, want to state that this feature of the bill was the occasion of very sharp differences in the committee, resulting in a compromise and the placing of a limitation of 18 months. It is the opinion of the Director General and of others connected with the administration that a shorter period than 18 months will certainly not be adequate to afford an opportunity for the adjustments which will be necessary between the railroads and the Government. Indeed, it is gravely doubtful whether 18 months will be long enough. I repeat the hope that the limitation of six months will not be placed in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays having been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair, as heretofore announced. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is detained from the Senate on account of illness in his family.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 47, as follows:

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the word "eighteen" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve," so that, if amended, it will read:

Twelve months after the proclamation of peace.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired, as heretofore announced. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. WEEKS's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is absent, for the reason I have already stated. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. If my colleague were present, he would have voted "yea" on the amendment I offered, and would vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and vote "nay."

So Mr. KING's amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment of which I move the adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 15, after the word "made" and before the word "the," it is proposed to insert the words "or pending the execution of an agreement," so that if amended it will read:

That if no such agreement is made, or pending the execution of an agreement.

Also, at the end of line 19, on page 5, it is proposed to insert the words "in cases where no agreement is made," so that if amended it will read:

That if no such agreement is made, or pending the execution of an agreement, the President may nevertheless pay to any carrier while under Federal control an annual amount, payable in reasonable installments, not exceeding 90 per cent of the estimated annual amount of just compensation, remitting such carrier, in cases where no agreement is made, to its legal rights for any balance claimed to the remedies provided in section 3 thereof.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, that is simply in line with the intention of the paragraph, and I see no objection to it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I move——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Delaware has not been disposed of yet.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood the Senator in charge of the bill to accept it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We must get that out of our heads at some time. The Senator in charge of the bill does not adopt amendments. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Now, Mr. President, on page 2, line 18, after the word "extensions," I move to insert the words "and the value of such retirements," which I hope will be acceptable to the Senator having charge of the bill, whether that disposes of it or not.

Now, Mr. President, just a word.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to just a brief statement? That provision, I think, has gone out of the bill on an amendment which I presented a day or two ago.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask what has been substituted for it?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, a provision was agreed to, striking out that part of the compensation based upon sums invested in the property during the six-months period ended December 31, 1917. A further amendment is required to effectuate the first amendment, as follows: Strike out all after the word "return," in line 17, page 2, down to and including the word "are," in line 18, and insert the word "is."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not think that affects the amendment which I have offered. The standard return and the cost of such additions, betterments, or road extensions are to be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the standard return is all that is left in the bill as the basis of compensation.

Mr. THOMAS. The bill makes no provision, as far as I am able to ascertain, for a means of determining the cost or value of retirements, and it is a very important subject. If there is such a provision in the bill, I should desire——

Mr. ROBINSON. That provision has gone out, and it was my oversight in not offering a further amendment to take that language out of the provision requiring the Interstate Commerce Commission to make the finding as to betterments, improvements, and retirements.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the bill contain any provision for ascertaining the value of retirements?

Mr. ROBINSON. It does not. There is no provision in the bill basing compensation on retirements now, and therefore there is no necessity for ascertaining that.

Mr. THOMAS. Accepting that statement, Mr. President, I, of course, do not insist upon the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. With the permission of the Senator from Colorado, I will state that I will offer the amendment which his suggestion has called to my attention as being necessary, and which I stated a moment ago.

Mr. THOMAS. Very well. I am satisfied with that statement.

Now, Mr. President, on page 3, I move to strike out all after the word "taxes," on line 7, down to and including the word "taxes," on line 9, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "heretofore or hereafter provided by law"; also to strike out the words "Federal or," on line 14, so that, if amended, the clause will read:

Every such agreement shall provide that any Federal taxes heretofore or hereafter provided by law—

And other taxes shall be paid in the manner which is set forth—

That other taxes assessed under any other governmental authority—

And so forth.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, on what page is this?

Mr. THOMAS. This is on page 3.

The bill as it now stands, Mr. President, provides that any Federal taxes under the act of October 3, 1917, commonly called war taxes, or any amendment thereto, shall be paid by the carrier out of its own funds or shall be charged against or deducted from the standard return, and that other taxes assessed under Federal authority shall be paid out of the revenues derived from railway, operations, and so forth. Now, we are all familiar with the fact that the act of 1916, increasing the normal income tax, applies to railways as well as other concerns, and that act has not been repealed by the act of 1917. Other taxes, notably a corporation stock tax, are provided in that act or the one preceding it, which must be paid by the corporation. As this bill stands, the only tax which the railroads are to pay under it is the war tax imposed under the act of 1917; and the Government will pay all the other taxes that may be and will be assessed against the roads under other laws. Now, that is wrong, and I do not think was intended by the committee. Nevertheless, that will be the construction placed upon this bill if my amendment is not accepted.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the method of ascertaining the compensation was to deduct all the taxes, add in all the taxes as part of the expense, and they therefore would be deducted to ascertain the net operating income which we will allow.

Mr. THOMAS. But the section does not so state. If the Senator will permit me, it is expressly provided that the corporation itself shall, out of its income, pay the war tax under the act of October, 1917, and that all other Federal taxes shall be paid out of the revenues derived from railway operation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS. Which means that if the bill stands as it is the Government will pay to itself the normal income tax of the corporation under the act of 1916 and the corporation-stock tax. My amendment is necessary if that is to be prevented, and, of course, these companies should pay, out of the enormous compensation we are to give them, all of the Federal taxes, no matter what their character, that may be assessed against them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I do not care to take this out of his time——

Mr. THOMAS. Unfortunately, that is the ruling of the Chair. If it were not for that I would willingly yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. When the Senator is through, then, I will make an explanation of the matter.

Mr. THOMAS. But the very fact that a different method of payment is provided for the two sets of taxes necessarily indicates that one comes out of the net profits of the railroads and the other comes out of the Government before the net profit is paid over. It was not intended by the committee, evidently, because the proposition is plainly unjust, but that is the necessary construction of the section to my mind. Let these corporations which we are to so handsomely reward pay all the taxes properly assessable against them

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the object that the committee had in view, and which I presume the expert lawyers on the committee have worked out, was this: That the tax mentioned here, particularly under the act of October 3, 1917, which is the excess-profits tax, should not be paid as a part of the regular taxes, but should be paid out of whatever returns we give the roads after deducting all the other ordinary taxes. We were going to leave the stockholders and the bondholders to pay that tax. In other words, up to the time that we make the compensation we deduct all the ordinary taxes provided for by law, except the tax that we impose under the act of October 3, 1917. That must continue, and, with whatever other war taxes may be placed upon this property, shall be paid by those who get the standard return, but before ever you pay the standard return you have deducted the ordinary taxes up until now.

Mr. THOMAS. Precisely.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. And will continue to deduct them.

Mr. THOMAS. Precisely.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. And when you have deducted them, then you require the beneficiaries of this amount to pay out of whatever we give them as standard compensation whatever other war taxes may come.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think my construction of this law is exactly right. The Government is going to pay its own taxes to itself, except the war tax of 1917.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I may miss the Senator's meaning. Before ever we allow them to have any standard compensation, we take out the tax.

Mr. THOMAS. Then why do you not take it all out—the taxes under the act of 1917 as well as the others?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The committee was of opinion that this excess-profits tax should be taken and put upon those who receive the dividends and who hold the bonds.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit a question, why should not those who receive the dividends and own the bonds pay the income tax assessed under the act of 1916?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. They do it, indirectly.

Mr. THOMAS. I am unable to perceive how.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The whole object of the committee was that this excess-profits tax should rest upon those who get the standard return, but that all of the normal standard tax should be deducted before ever we allow them the compensation. That was my understanding of this proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired, as heretofore announced. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to state that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness in his family.

Mr. McLEAN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 50, as follows:

So Mr. THOMAS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to reserve the right to offer this amendment again when the bill comes into the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has that right.

Mr. ROBINSON. I offer now the amendment I referred to while the Senator from Colorado had the floor. On page 2, line 17, I move to strike out all language after the word "return," down to and including the word "are," and insert the word "is," so that it will read: "That standard return is to be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission." As I stated while the Senator from Colorado had the floor, this amendment is necessary in order to effectuate an amendment that the Senate agreed to the other day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, lines 17 and 18, strike out the words "and the cost of such additions, betterments, or road extensions are" and insert the word "is," so that the sentence will read:

The standard return is to be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission from the reports, books, and other pertinent data of such carrier and certified by it to the President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I offer an amendment and call it especially to the attention of the chairman of the committee. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, at the end of line 7, insert the following words:

Proceedings in the Court of Claims under this section shall be given precedence and expedited in every practicable way.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I hope that amendment will be adopted, because it is right along the line of expediting the work on which the bill is drawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I move that the words "during the period of Federal control," in lines 19 and 20, on page 7, be stricken out, and that, after the word "compensation," in line 17, on the same page, the words "or return" be inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 17, after the word "compensation," insert the words "or return," and, on lines 19 and 20, strike out the words "during the period of Federal control," so that, if amended, the proviso will read:

Provided, That there shall be no increase of compensation or return for any additions, improvements, or betterments constructed out of or purchased by the earnings for investments or surplus.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to prevent the claim that the railway companies are entitled to an additional return, whether in Federal control or after Federal control, upon values which have been created by the investment of surplus earned out of the transportation of persons or property. As everybody knows, it has been contended for a long time that when railroad companies earned more than enough to pay the expenses of maintenance and operation, more than enough to pay the interest on their bonds for fixed charges of all kinds and adequate dividends upon their capital, any surplus existing after those payments are made, and which are invested in the property of the railway company, ought not to be made the basis for increased returns upon capital in the future.

This view was urged before the committee, and the committee adopted the view, to the extent of affirming the principles, by saying that we should pay no increased compensation for added values of this kind during the period of Federal control. My amendment simply projects that principle into the future, if the roads are ever returned to private ownership and management. If we are to adopt the important principle during Federal control the bill already does, how can it be urged that after the property is returned to the several railway companies they shall be permitted to earn a return upon values created during Federal control out of surplus earnings after the full compensation for the capital involved?

I appeal to the Senate, and especially to the members of the committee who are familiar with the whole controversy, not to be so inconsistent and illogical as to deny to these railroad companies additional returns upon these values while in Federal control after permitting additional returns or added compensation for the same value after the property passes back into private operation.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to explain to the Senate a little more what this amendment means. It would prohibit any railroad company having any surplus on hand over and above the dividends it had paid, not fair dividends. Those dividends might not be more than 1 or 2 per cent. The company might have a surplus on hand now which it desired to invest in betterments and improvements, and certainly no one can claim that surplus property taken out of dividends and which the company determined to put in its property instead of giving it out to stockholders should not be capital.

The committee attempted to simply provide a policy as to betterments and improvements made out of surplus over and above dividends during Federal control; that that surplus, whatever it amounted to over and above the dividends which they were allowed to pay under this bill, should not be used to increase the guaranteed income of the road during the Federal control.

We did not desire to go into the future, after Federal control, and to settle a policy for the railroad companies, rather leaving all questions to be settled by the Congress before the railroads should be turned back.

There is, of course, much to be said to the effect that where a railroad company has paid a reasonable dividend upon its value or its stock and bonds surplus over and above that amount invested in the property should not be capitalized or used as a basis for making rates. But surplus that the companies now have on hand, a surplus which should have earned less than a fair dividend, certainly should be capital to the stockholders.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have but five minutes, and I can not yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply want to advise the Senator that I exactly agree with him. I think there ought to be a provision for the allowance of reasonable dividends, and the Senator from Minnesota knows I intended that. I adopted the language in the bill rather than to offer an independent amendment of my own. I intend to amend it in that way.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, it does seem to me that we ought not to prevent the roads from using the surplus which they now have on hand or to project any policy into the future beyond the Government control. Those policies should be settled at that time.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. I can not. I have only five minutes, and I prefer the Senator to use his own time.

Mr. REED. I want to get light from the Senator. I can not get it myself.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I believe that the amendment as it exists here goes too far, and certainly the amendment of the Senator from Iowa goes much too far. I believe that so far as it is possible we ought not to undertake in this bill to settle the policies of railroad control, railroad management and capitalization and what should be capitalized and what should not be capitalized.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in my own time I will ask the Senator a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I shall be very glad to answer it.

Mr. REED. The Senator speaks about the surplus the railroad may have on hand now that it may desire to invest. Of course under the terms of the bill as it is drawn it would get no return upon those investments during the time of governmental control. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; as the bill is now drawn any surplus on hand when the Government took over the road, if they invested it, would be the same as their capital, but under the bill as drawn any surplus made over and above dividends during the Government control can not be used to increase the income of the road during the time of that control.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think that the latter income he has just spoken of is likely to be invested at all during Government control when there is an absolute prohibition against any income being paid on it?

Mr. KELLOGG. There is some question about that, and I am not sure of the wisdom of the clause that is in the bill now, but certainly it is not wise to go further than that.

Mr. REED. It seems to me, if the Senator's contention is correct, it is perfectly plain that a road will not be deterred from putting its income back into its property by the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, if it put it in the teeth of a provision which denied it any return during the period of the war or the period of control; that is, for the war, and as the bill now stands for 18 months thereafter. It occurs to me that the opposition has not very much ground to stand upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not rise to speak on the amendment. I desire to modify the amendment by adding, after the word "surplus," the words "after allowance for reasonable dividends."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated as modified.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 17, after the word "compensation," insert the words "or return," and, on lines 19 and 20, strike out the words "earned during the period of Federal control" and insert "after allowance for reasonable dividends," so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That there shall be no increase of compensation or return for any additions, improvements, or betterments constructed out of or purchased by the earnings for investment or surplus after allowance for reasonable dividends.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I make a like announcement as to my pair and the transfer of it, as on the former vote, to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], who is absent; but I was permitted by him to cast my vote, as I have done, in his absence. He also stated that he would vote for the bill on its passage, whenever that may occur.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	McNary	Thomas

So the amendment of Mr. CUMMINS was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the second paragraph of section 10, which begins on page 11, line 13, down to and including line 2, on page 12, as amended, and to insert:

Provided, That with respect to rates, charges, and fares for the transportation of persons and property (except troops and Government property) the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and all amendments thereto shall remain in full force and effect, and the Interstate Commerce Commission shall continue to exercise all the powers conferred in said act; and the President shall have no greater power respecting rates, charges, and fares for the transportation of persons and property (except troops and Government property) than carriers have heretofore had under the said act.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this amendment presents squarely the question that has been more than once suggested and debated in the last day or two. Under this amendment the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to rates and charges for the transportation of persons and property in general commerce is preserved unimpaired and untouched, the President having absolute power under the previous part of the section to dispose of every other question relating to the operation and management of railways. The bill as it is, as I remarked in my minority report, keeps the promise to the ear but breaks it to the hope. It gives the President the right to initiate rates, as my amendment does, but it gives him also the power to put the new rates instantly into effect, and they can only be modified upon the complaint of some interested person after a hearing by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mark you, I am not impairing or infringing upon the authority given to the President in any other thing save the fixing of rates in general commerce, and the difference between the amendment I have offered and the bill as it is lies practically in two things: First, it will give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to suspend a rate proposed by the carrier or by the President; second, it will make it necessary that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall approve the rate, if it be an increase over the existing rate, before it goes into effect. In that way we may be able, notwithstanding the enormous influence of the Executive—an influence which in recent years unhappily has embraced the Interstate Commerce Commission—notwithstanding that pernicious activity, we may be able to preserve some power in the commission. But under the bill as it is there is no hope of any practical exercise of power upon the part of the commission.

I want to present the question fairly and fully as to whether the Senate desires that in future the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the same power over rates which it now possesses under the law. Remember, however, when you are voting upon it that it does not interfere with the President's absolute power in every other respect.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator mean that he wishes the Interstate Commerce Commission to retain its present power with respect to fixing and adjusting competitive rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Interstate Commerce Commission has no power to fix or adjust competitive rates so far as I know.

Mr. STONE. I thought where there were questions arising between railroads running in different directions—competing lines—that it had the power to fix rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. It has the power to fix rates for every railway company in the country, but it has no power to adjust competitive rates, because really there is no such thing as a competitive rate; that is to say, which is recognized by the law.

Mr. STONE. Well, then, does the Senator mean that the Interstate Commerce Commission must retain the power of fixing rates generally?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do. I am insisting that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be the tribunal, as heretofore, for the establishment of rates for the transportation of property in general—not Government property or Government troops.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the amendment which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has presented relates to one of the most fiercely contested questions involved in this bill. The provision in the bill was the result of a compromise, to which I referred yesterday, and gives the President the power to initiate rates and put them into effect, subject to the right of the Interstate Commerce Commission to review them as to justness and reasonableness.

I maintain, Mr. President, that under Federal control much power is necessarily vested in the President. In the first place, it has become necessary for the purpose of relieving congestion in the eastern ports to divert a large volume of traffic to South Atlantic and Gulf ports, and it may prove wise to divert some even to Pacific ports. This can not be done without a quick readjustment of rates between these ports. It may be necessary to increase rates to the eastern ports, to discourage traffic in that direction, and thus induce it to go to ports less congested. It is manifest that there must be a great many readjustments of joint rates to accommodate this new movement of traffic, which would involve long delays if the ordinary peace processes before the Interstate Commerce Commission in respect to the increase of rates should be followed.

In the next place, because of war conditions the country is confronted with the withdrawal of water transportation all along the Atlantic coast, and notably from New England points, and many essential commodities, such as coal, must now move entirely by rail. The rail rates were perhaps in many instances fixed in order to meet water competition, and the railroads can not be made to carry the traffic in all instances without some increase in rates. It may become necessary, in the third place, in the public interest to increase or reduce rates under many circumstances during Federal control, and if the President be deprived of this power it will limit him in the effective operation of the railroads during this very great emergency.

Mr. President, Federal control implies a readjustment to some extent of the conditions and rates that prevailed during peace. There has been already, and there will hereafter be, a great diversion of freight, a great rerouting of freight, and to require the President to wait until the Interstate Commerce Commission has gone through its quasi judicial processes and determined these questions would be to deprive the Government of the benefit of prompt action in the matter of Federal control.

I maintain that the committee has adopted about the best provision to meet the conflicting views that can be written into this bill, and I express the hope that the Senate will defeat the amendment and sustain the committee's provision, which grants the minimum authority in the Executive necessary for effective Federal control as to the making of rates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—24.

Cummins	Hitchcock	Nelson	Stone
Curtis	Johnson, Cal.	New	Sutherland

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. STONE. In this connection, Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram which I send to the desk.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KANSAS CITY, MO., February 21, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM J. STONE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

At a special called meeting this date of the board of directors of the chamber and representative shippers to consider rate-control features of railroad bills in Congress, we respectfully urge the amendment and enacting of the Senate bill, providing that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall continue to exercise full control of all rates and charges of railroads during Government operation, subject to all provisions of the act to regulate commerce, especially relating to discriminatory and prejudicial rates and suspension of date effective thereof pending public hearing. We make no suggestions as to other features of the proposed legislation empowering the President to deal with the carriers during the period of the war.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF KANSAS CITY, MO.,
C. W. LONSDALE,
Third Vice President, in Charge of Traffic.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I desire to invite the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the provision of this bill at pages 9 and 10, section 7, where the President is given discretionary power to buy certain railroad stocks and securities at par, but he has no discretion whatever in selling those securities.

It seems to me that the President should be given some discretion in disposing of railroad stocks. He can not dispose of them at less than cost, no matter how badly he may want to do so. If there is any good reason for thus restricting his power to divest the Government of railroad stocks purchased under the authority of this bill, I should like to know what the reason is?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think the only object that the committee had in view was that when these securities were purchased, without making some limitation as to what should be the price, it might be possible that they would lay themselves open to the charge of having disposed of them at a sacrifice. I can see the point that the Senator is making. In that connection, the provision reads:

The President may purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities at prices not exceeding par.

Which means that he may purchase at any price——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Less than par.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Less than par; and I do not know that there is any valid reason why he may not be allowed to sell them under such conditions as would be for the best interests of the public in general.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is exactly the point I desire to make.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I see no objection to that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It seems to me that all after the word "desirable," in line 4, down to the semicolon, ought to be stricken out, so that the provision would read:

The President may purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities at prices not exceeding par, and may sell such securities whenever in his judgment it is desirable.

That amendment ought to be made. Otherwise we may get into the Treasury of the United States millions of dollars' worth of stocks and bonds that we can not get rid of unless the President goes into the open market and bolsters up that market. To make him such an instrument of questionable propriety is beyond belief.

I therefore move, Mr. President, to strike out the words "at prices not less than the cost thereof," in line 4, on page 10; and after what the Senator from South Carolina, in charge of the bill, has said about it, I hope the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just one word. The object of allowing the President to buy these securities at all is that the market is not and will not be in a condition to purchase them. If we give the President the power to purchase these securities at par and then allow him to sell them at less than par, the President could throw these very securities upon the market, and that would have a worse effect than if forced upon the market by the roads themselves.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption, to throw them upon the market, of course, would challenge the discretion and the patriotism of the President. I am not doing that; and to make it necessary for him to bolster the entire market before he could part with these stocks would be a strange thing for the President of the United States to undertake.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not think the Government of the United States would have to invest any money in these securities unless the condition of the money market was such as now exists. I think the Government ought to buy the securities at par, if it buys them at all, and I do not believe it ought to sell them below par, nor should we authorize them to be sold below par, because after normal conditions have been restored the President can sell these securities at par and perhaps above. It does seem to me that they ought not to be sold by the Government of the United States for less than it paid for them, and not until financial conditions are normal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of section 1, the following:

Provided, That in no case shall the net income—that is, the sum remaining after deducting for operation, maintenance, taxes, fixed charges, interest on funded and unfunded debt and all other items of expense according to the system of accounting established by the Interstate Commerce Commission—of any such carrier exceed 5 per cent on the par value of its capital stock—eliminating duplications—outstanding on the 31st day of December, 1917.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this amendment recalls the attention of the Senate to the subject of compensation during Federal control.

The amendment which I offered yesterday, or day before, was scientifically correct, so far as its expression was concerned, but I believe that a great many Senators failed to comprehend its effect upon the bill by reason of the intricacy of the subject. I have reduced the matter to its last analysis in the amendment which I have just offered, and it is so simple that anyone, no matter how unfamiliar with the bookkeeping or system of accounts established by the commission, can comprehend it.

It provides that the net income, after the payment of all expenses of every character, including interest and taxes of every kind that can be possibly assessed against the railway company, shall not exceed 5 per cent upon the par value of the stock outstanding on the 31st day of December, 1917, that being the day upon which we began our new relation to the railway companies.

I believe that in the emergency through which we are passing 5 per cent is adequate compensation. I believe that in view of the sacrifices and hardships which the American people are expected to make and to suffer we ought not to pay these securities more than 5 per cent, for then they are closely related in value to the bonds which the Government expects the people to take, the proceeds from which will enable us to carry on the war.

Now, that is my view, but if this amendment is not acceptable I intend to offer another providing for 6 per cent. I want to get, if I can, the sober, intelligent view of the Senate with regard to the dividends that ought to be paid upon the stock of railroad corporations during this war, and I know of no way in which to get that view except to ask a vote upon the proposition I have made, which strips the subject of all the verbal obscurities in which the bill itself is couched.

If no other Senator desires to speak upon the amendment, or in any event, Mr. President, I will ask at this time that when the vote is taken upon the amendment it shall be by the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to have that matter determined now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I just want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is the identical proposition that the Senator from Iowa has offered here more than once, and it has been voted down more than once. It simply means that he is committing the Government to a policy that has not obtained at any time, at any place, anywhere, and restricting the roads to an amount sufficient to pay a certain rate of interest on their bonds and dividends on their stock, and, outside of that, no earnings whatsoever. He knows as well as the committee knows that we have had no way to ascertain whether or not this would be a just compensation. He knows as well as the committee knows that it would rob the President of the basis which we hope will be one upon which he and the railroads can agree. He knows that rather than submit to some arbitrary statutory enactment as the basis upon which they will settle, which it is beyond the province of this legislature to make, the roads will go into the courts, and the precious time that is necessary for us to mobilize and use these indispensable resources of our economic life will have passed.

The Senator knows that this is not the time or the place for us to determine the question of the justice of returns to the railroads. Every man on the floor of the Senate will address himself at the proper time to that question, but this is not the proper time, and I do not know why the Senator insists upon bringing it up and having it defeated and still bringing it up again. He is not detracting from the patriotism of any man here by putting us on record as to how we stand on this matter. I say here and now that I am willing to bear my share of the so-called burden that we are going to pay the railroads, if in bearing it we can expedite matters and cause us the more readily and easily to win the terrible conflict we are in. But in order to save one or two or three million dollars, perhaps, let us not jeopardize the whole scheme and throw it all into the courts for a mere question of dollars and cents. We are passing this legislation for the purpose of getting the forces of America mobilized as quickly and as powerfully as we may, in order to win this war. We can not sit down and calculate nicely what the shippers and the railroads are entitled to in a nicely balanced peacetime condition.

I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment and give the President the latitude that this bill gives him, to agree with these people who have their money invested in these roads on any basis that he can within the provisions of the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, adopting the phraseology of the chairman of the committee, it might be said that he knows that the adoption of this amendment or any other amendment fixing a compensation will not delay the taking over of these roads one second, because the roads have already been taken over. It might be further said that he knows perfectly well that it will not unstabilize financial conditions, because the road refusing to accept the 5 per cent return will surely be a road that would hope to get a larger return than 5 per cent by going into court; and the road that can fairly hope to have more than 5 per cent net return is not the kind of road the securities of which will in any manner disturb the financial market.

When we consider the question so often raised to cover every defect and every imperfection, that we must do this in order to win the war, it will be difficult to understand how keeping railroad companies down to a fair return upon their capital can in any way militate against the success of our fortunes on the western front or on the high seas. The truth of the matter is that as we are drawing this bill we are putting some few restrictions in, we are laying down some rules to be followed, and the sole question is, Ought we to provide that no railroad company shall receive more than 5 per cent net upon its stock? It seems to me that that question ought to be settled upon its merits. It does seem to me that an absolute guaranteed return of 5 per cent for a period of the war and 18 months thereafter would be a condition that most financial institutions of the United States and most individuals would like to be assured of upon their investments.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, neither this amendment nor any individual connected with the amendment, of course, impugns the patriotism of any Senator upon this floor. We recognize the unselfish devotion of those who are upon the committee, and the patriotism of all those who have voted with the majority. Their patriotism and unselfishness as evinced by their action on this bill are far beyond any dispute or any cavil of ours whatever.

This amendment, however—and I trust if it is defeated it will be followed with other amendments of a like sort at 6 and 7 per cent as well—says to the railroad companies of the United States in time of war that they shall be paid every dollar of expense, every penny of interest that may be due upon any outstanding indebtedness or outstanding bond, and then that there shall be paid to them 5 per cent upon their capital stock. It is a sorry compliment to the railroad companies and to the railroad magnates of this land, it is a pitiful tribute to their patriotism, that any Senator should insist that that does not, in this time of crisis and war, do ample, full, and complete justice to them, and to every one of them.

I can conceive of no rational theory upon which to every business in this land a lesser rate should be guaranteed in this crisis and to the railroads of the land 5 per cent and more.

If this amendment be defeated I trust the Senator from Iowa will follow it with an amendment allowing the railroad companies 6 per cent on their capital stock, and then an amendment providing for 7 per cent, and let us see just exactly the extent of the generosity of Congress to railroad proprietors in time of crisis and in time of war, in time of sacrifice of men and of women and children in this land, in time of sacrifice of property and of blood.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Will the Senator allow me? It is not a question of 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, or 20 per cent. It is a question in this bill of leaving it to the discretion of the President to take what the railroads have earned and reach a basis of agreement as to what he will pay them.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. On the contrary, Mr. President, in reply—for I have only a minute and a half—I say to the Senator from South Carolina he is inaccurate in his statement. The bill provides the particular mode of compensation. The President has stated the mode that he will adopt. The Director General has stated his intention, and the intention of the Director General and the rate of compensation in the proclamation by the President are alike. It is the intention to pay exactly the rate that is specified in this particular bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, those intentions have never been communicated to the committee; certainly not to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. In answer, Mr. President, I say they were communicated in the original proclamation of the President. They were stated in his address given to both Houses. I am told by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that they were stated by Director General McAdoo in his testimony before the particular committee. If I am in error in the latter statement, I may stand corrected, but the statement has never been challenged. They are of record in the proclamation of the President and they are of record as well in the President's address to Congress delivered only a brief period ago; they are of record in the proceedings of the committee and of record in the bill before us. Whether of record or not, here now is submitted that the rate of compensation shall not exceed, after all payments of interest, indebtedness, and so forth, 5 per cent. Hereafter, if this amendment be defeated, the compensation will be increased to 6 per cent. If that be defeated, then we offer 7 per cent. Can more be asked of a kindly and tender and overgenerous Congress?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That was to be the basis on which compensation was to be reckoned. The average of three years' net earnings was the basis upon which the agreement was to be reached. I will just call the attention of the Senator to one glaring instance in the table given by the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired. Is there further discussion? If not, the yeas and nays have been demanded on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and transferring that pair to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], I vote "nay."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], which I transfer to the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 19, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—19.

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of section 1 the following:

Provided, That in no case shall the net income (that is, the sum remaining after deducting for operation, maintenance, taxes, fixed charges, interest in funded and unfunded debt, and all other items of expense according to the system of accounting established by the Interstate Commerce Commission) of any such carrier exceed 6 per cent on the par value of its capital stock (eliminating duplications) outstanding on the 31st day of December, 1917.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it will be observed that this amendment is precisely in terms like the one just voted upon except that it permits a dividend of 6 per cent upon the capital stock outstanding on the 31st day of December. It is offered, as I shall offer another one, in the hope that we may not close this bill with the extravagant compensation now provided remaining in it.

I ask for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired as heretofore announced, and I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—24.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but I am informed that if he were present he would vote as I am about to vote. I therefore regard myself as at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

So the amendment of Mr. CUMMINS was rejected.

Mr. RANSDELL. I submit an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 17, after the word "interest," it is proposed to insert "including the construction of tracks, structures, and equipment to facilitate the exchange of traffic between carriers by water and carriers by rail."

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I regard this as quite an important amendment. It is barely possible that it may be included in the terms of the bill, but I am not at all clear as to that. It certainly is very important that water carriers, if used, as I hope and believe they will be used under the power given to the President in this bill, will be enabled to cooperate in a businesslike manner with the railways.

The waterways, as everyone knows, are not being used at the present time. There are very few carriers on them—very few boats. They have been completely neglected and overlooked. We criticize the Germans in a great many respects, but we might well imitate them in utilizing our waterways as they have been utilizing theirs. Many of the closest students of the subject think that the great development of Germany during the last 40 years is due more to the wise and businesslike development of its waterway systems than to any other one cause.

This bill provides, at the close of section 6, that out of the revolving fund of $500,000,000 the President shall have authority to build boats and barges for the various canals and rivers of the country, if he deems it advisable so to do. The purpose of my amendment is to authorize him, beyond any question, to make physical connection between the railways and the boat lines. We know that that does not exist at the present time, or that it exists in very few places. If we are to utilize rivers and canals, it can not be done effectively except by making the railway and the waterway cooperate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a question?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will yield for a question, but not for an argument.

Mr. POMERENE. Merely for a question. The Senator has stated that there were very few boats on the rivers.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is true.

Mr. PEMERENE. Now, then, with what are we to connect the railways if there are no boats?

Mr. RANSDELL. There are some boats now; and the provision which I propose would authorize the President to put on more boats. I sincerely hope we are going to use a part of this $500,000,000 in putting more boats on the rivers. We could not expend it in a wiser or better way. We could not expend it in a way which would give greater returns to the American people. We could not help them more than by utilizing these splendid God-given highways, which have been allowed to go to utter neglect in this country.

Mr. President, I wish to ask that a very brief address, of some eight pages, delivered by Mr. S. A. Thompson, on "The relation of improved waterways to foreign trade" be published along with my remarks. The address was delivered two years ago before the Third National Foreign Trade Convention at New Orleans. It contains some splendid thoughts and very valuable data.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the request, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is to publish somebody's speech as a part of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. GALLINGER. I must object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. RANSDELL. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not make the objection. Let me state what the matter is. It is a very brief address, covering eight narrow pages, which was delivered two years ago before the Foreign Trade Council at New Orleans. I shall simply have to read it if the Senator objects to printing it. It is not a political speech, but it is a discussion, in a very forceful manner, of the merits of the question of transportation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think we ought to keep that kind of matter out of the RECORD until we can get paper enough to print the RECORD for our constituents.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that, while I respect him very much, that matter shall go into the RECORD if I am obliged to stand in my place here and read it. The Senator will not accomplish anything by his objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. RANSDELL. Very well; I shall resume later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and desire to say now that I do not intend to ask for a roll call upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 9, after the word "desirable," it is proposed to insert the following proviso.

Provided, That upon the termination of the war the President shall appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate, a board of railway directors, to be composed of five persons, one of whom shall be an engineer, one a financier, one trained in the operation of railway property, one whose interests have allied him with the shipping public, and one a lawyer. The members of the board shall hold office during the remainder of the period of Federal control. Removals must be for cause shown, and vacancies shall be filled in the same manner as original appointments are made. Each of said directors shall receive compensation at the rate of $12,500 per year. The principal office shall be in the District of Columbia. All necessary employees of the board shall be appointed by the board under the rules of the Civil Service Commission.

Immediately upon the organization of said board of directors all the powers, whether granted by the act of August 29, 1916, or herein granted to the President, shall vest in said board of railway directors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I proceed now to read the address to which I have referred. It is a speech of Mr. S. A. Thompson, delivered before the Third National Foreign Trade Convention, held in New Orleans, on January 29, 1916:

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it may seem presumptuous for anyone on this closing day of the convention to attempt to add anything whatever to the able addresses and the interesting and enlightening discussions to which we have already listened. I crave your indulgence for a few minutes, however, while I briefly discuss a factor which bears a fundamental relation to trade both foreign and domestic, one which is of vital importance to commerce both under the normal conditions of peace and in the emergencies produced by war. I refer to transportation.

"Transportation affects the price of everything bought or sold by any individual. It limits the territory tributary to the trade of any city. It determines the development of the resources of any State. And, far more than any other one thing, it fixes the share obtained by any nation in the commerce of the world.

"Unlike manufacture, which transforms crude materials into products adapted for human use, transportation changes the location of things without changing their character. The cost of transportation, therefore, is a tax which must be paid either by the producer or the consumer, or, as is sometimes the case, divided between the two.

"This transportation tax is by far the heaviest one we pay. Official figures for the year 1913 show that if to the total expenditures made by the National Government, for all purposes, we add all those made by the 48 States, by every county in all these States, and by every city, town, and incorporated village in the country with a population of 2,500 or over, the whole vast total sum could have been paid out of the gross earnings and income of our railways for the same year, and there would then have been left a surplus of $152,000,000.

"So, as you see, one form of transportation alone, the railway, collects from the average citizen of the United States more than he pays for the support of the Nation, the State, the county, and the city or village in which he lives. A little study of the cost of transportation by different methods may give us some light on the possibility of getting our transportation taxes reduced.

"The experts of the Agricultural Department estimate the cost of transporting a ton of freight a distance of 1 mile by horse and wagon, on the average road in the United States, at 23 cents. In England, where the roads are much better than most of those in this country and where much attention has been given to the development of what the English call a steam lorry and we would call a steam truck, it is said that goods can be carried for 5 cents per ton per mile.

"The average rate on all the railroads in the United States during the past few years has been about 7½ mills per ton per mile, but I can pick out a special group of roads upon which the average has been about 5 mills.

"On the Erie Canal in recent years the ton-mile rate has been about 3 mills, while on certain canals in Europe, which are deeper and wider and on which electric or other mechanical systems of haulage are used, the rate is 2 mills.

"The official records kept at the 'Soo' show that the average rate on the freight carried into and out of Lake Superior in 1913 was two-thirds of a mill per ton-mile, while coal is habitually carried from Buffalo to Duluth, and I have the authority of the Pittsburgh Coal Exchange for the statement that it has often been carried from Pittsburgh to New Orleans for one-third of a mill per ton per mile.

"These are microscopic figures; let me translate them into something with which the average business man is more familiar. Here is something [holding up a dollar bill] with which I hope all of you are very much more familiar than I am. Suppose you have a ton of freight to ship and a dollar to spend in shipping it. How far will the dollar carry the ton by these different methods and at these different rates of transportation?

"By horse and wagon, a little over 4 miles; by English steam truck, 20 miles; by rail, at the average rate for United States railways, 133 miles; at the rate on the group of selected railways, 200 miles; on the Erie Canal, 333 miles; on the European canals, 500 miles; by lake, at the average rate through the 'Soo' Canal in 1913, 1,500 miles; while at the rate at which coal is carried, both on the Great Lakes and on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, the ton of freight can be shipped 30 miles for a cent, 300 miles for a dime, 3,000 miles for a dollar.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, notwithstanding the eloquent and instructive speech of the Senator from Louisiana in support of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa, I trust the amendment may be defeated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANSDELL. I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 13, after the word "facilities," it is proposed to insert "including terminals and their equipment."

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if the insertion of the words "including terminals and their equipment," after the word "facilities," in line 13, was considered by his committee, and if, in his judgment, they are included in the intendment, at any rate, of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think that both amendments which have been offered by the Senator from Louisiana are absolutely covered by this bill. We make provision for the purchasing of boats and the utilization of waterways and canals as a part of the systems taken over; and I think that wherever indicated the President certainly will take advantage of such facilities if that is for the benefit of the public.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am delighted to have that expression of opinion from the chairman of the committee. I will now proceed with what I was reading:

"The difference in the rates of transportation by different methods seems to be sufficiently great to be worthy of serious consideration, but there is more in this matter than has yet been made apparent. Taking any point as a center—and naturally each one of you will think of your own city as a center—over how great a territory will a dollar carry a ton by these different methods and at these various rates of transportation?

"By horse and wagon, over a circle a little more than 8 miles in diameter; with the English steam truck on the English good road, the diameter of the circle becomes 40 miles; at the average railway rate in the United States, it expands to 266 miles; at the rate on the selected railways, to 400 miles; at the Erie Canal rate, to 666 miles; at the European canal rate, to 1,000 miles; at the 'Soo' Canal rate, to 3,000 miles; while at the coal rate which has been named, the dollar will carry the ton to the outer limits of a circle 6,000 miles in diameter.

"Let me give you a concrete illustration of the difference in the cost of transportation by water and by rail. Through the 'Soo' Canal, at the outlet of Lake Superior, there were carried, in 1913, 79,718,344 tons of freight. This was carried an average distance of 820 miles, at an average cost of two-thirds of 1 mill per ton per mile. If this same quantity of freight had been sent an equal distance by rail at the average rate received by United States railways for that year it would have cost $445,555,488—and 59 cents, if you want to be particular about it—more than was actually paid for its transportation by water.

"Let me hasten to add, however, that if Noah had prophesied a drought instead of a flood, and had issued bonds to construct an irrigation system instead of building an ark, he would have been a bright and shining example of business sagacity compared to a railway man who opposes the improvement of waterways. For, paradoxical as it may seem, the truth is that the best thing that can happen to a railway is to have a waterway paralleling every mile of its track. Indeed I have never been able to find an instance where the improvement of an existing waterway or the creation of a new one has done anything else than to increase the business and the dividends of competing railways. Can any gentleman present tell me of a different result?

"The reason that waterways benefit railways is also one of the fundamental reasons why improved waterways benefit foreign trade. It goes without saying that internal development must precede external commerce, and the more intensive the internal development the more extensive the external trade may be. Now, waterways have what may properly be termed a creative effect. If a whole mountain is full of valuable minerals only a small portion of the metal can be secured by a tunnel which enters the mountain near the top, but the lower the level at which a tunnel can be driven the greater the number of veins which can be tapped.

"A country may be full of natural resources, yet if none but a costly form of transportation is available few of them can be developed. Every decrease in cost of transportation, like the driving of a tunnel at a lower level, makes possible the utilization of additional resources.

"There are vast quantities of crude, raw materials which can only be profitably moved at a rate which is below the absolute cost of railway operation. But these crude materials, when moved by the cheap transportation which waterways can give, furnish the foundation for great industries, to the benefit both of the territory developed and of the railways by which it is served. Let me give you a concrete illustration.

"The city of Frankfort, in Germany, is said to have been founded by the Romans about the year 150 A. D. Through the slow movement of the centuries Frankfort grew until, in 1881, it had a population of about 140,000. Something happened to change the rate of growth, for in the 20 years following 1886 Frankfort grew more in industry, in commerce, in population, and in wealth than it had grown in all the previous seventeen hundred years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am simply going to ask the reporters that the speech be put in the RECORD just as it has been read, and not as a whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is their duty.

Mr. SMOOT. Some speeches have been printed otherwise.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator need not bother about that. It is a matter for the reporters to attend to.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can bother about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator can not bother about it. It must go in precisely as delivered here, without any request of the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask that the pending amendment be stated again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 13, after the word "facilities," it is proposed to insert the words "including terminals and their equipment."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am only going to observe that I think the Senator from Louisiana is pursuing rather an extraordinary course, and I hope that in due time he will reach the terminal.

Mr. RANSDELL. I hope, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana has had his five minutes. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment. There being no further amendment——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have a substitute to offer. If there is not any other amendment to be offered, I will offer the substitute now. I was under the impression that I could not offer a substitute while there was an amendment pending to perfect the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no amendment pending now.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk in the form of a substitute.

The amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the President being authorized in time of war to take possession, assume control, and utilize systems of transportation, it is hereby declared that the United States will pay just compensation for property now or hereafter taken by the exercise of such authority.

SEC. 2. That where used in this act—

The term "Federal control" means the possession, control, and utilization of a railroad or system of transportation under authority of this act or of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916, whether now or hereafter assumed.

The term "owner" includes any person, corporation, partnership, or association who, during any portion of the period of Federal control of a railroad or system of transportation would be entitled to the possession, use, and control of such railroad or system in the absence of Federal control thereof. Wherever in this act reference is made to the period of Federal control in connection with an owner, it shall be taken to refer to the portion of such period during which such owner, but for such Federal control, would have been entitled to the possession, use, and control of the railroad or system of transportation.

SEC. 3. That the President is authorized to make with the owner of any railroad or system of transportation under Federal control for which operating returns were made to the Interstate Commerce Commission during the three years ending June 30, 1917, an agreement substantially as follows:

(1) That during the period of Federal control the United States shall pay to such owner—

(a) An annual sum, to be fixed in the agreement, not exceeding the average annual railway operating income from such railroad or system for the three years ending June 30, 1917. In the computation of such income, debits and credits arising from the accounts called in the monthly reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission equipment rents and joint-facility rents shall be included, but debits and credits arising from the operation of such street electric passenger railways, including railways commonly called interurbans, as are at the time of the agreement not under Federal control, shall be excluded. If any lines were acquired by, leased to, or consolidated with such railroad or system between July 1, 1914, and December 31, 1917, both inclusive, and separate operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission were not made for such lines after such acquisition, lease, or consolidation, there shall be included in such income an amount representing as nearly as may be what would have been the annual average railway operating income of such lines during the three years ending June 30, 1917, if such separate operating returns had been made.

(b) An annual sum equivalent to an agreed percentage upon the cost of any additions and betterments, less retirements and road extensions, made on or in connection with such railroad or system during the six months ending December 31, 1917.

(c) An annual sum equivalent to a fair percentage upon the cost of additions and betterments, less retirements and road extensions, made on or in connection with such railroad or system during the period of Federal control by the owner, with the approval or by the order of the President, out of funds other than surplus earned or earnings from investments during the period of Federal control, plus a fair percentage upon the amount expended by the owner, during the period of Federal control, for taxes chargeable under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917, to investment in road and equipment, and for assessments for public improvements. Such fair percentage in the case of expenditures made out of borrowed money shall be equal to the rate at which such money is borrowed, and in other cases shall be fixed by the President at the time the expenditure is made.

(d) Such average annual railway operating income, the cost of such additions, betterments, and road extensions, the amount of such retirements, and the amounts expended for such taxes and assessments shall be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission and certified by it to the President. The amounts so certified shall, for the purpose of the agreement, be conclusive.

(e) The annual sums above referred to shall be reduced pro rata for any portion of a year during which Federal control does not continue.

(f) Any annual sum required to be paid by the United States under this subdivision shall be paid in such installments as may be agreed upon.

(2) That the United States shall pay to the owner any loss accruing to such owner by reason of any additions, betterments, or road extensions made during the period of Federal control by the President, or made during such period at the order of or with the approval of the President, by such owner, or by the person, corporation, partnership, or association entitled to the possession, use, and control of the railroad or system of transportation at the time such additions, betterments, or road extensions are made. The amount of such loss shall be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission and certified by it to the President. The amount so certified shall, for the purpose of the agreement, be conclusive.

(3) That all taxes assessed for the period of Federal control (which but for such Federal control would under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force December 27, 1917, be deducted from "net revenue from railway operations" in determining "railway operating income") shall, except as hereinafter provided, be paid from operating revenue, or if that is insufficient for the purpose, then from the revolving fund created by this act. If Federal control begins or ends during the tax year for which any taxes may be assessed, the taxes for such year shall be apportioned to the date of the beginning or ending of such Federal control, and the foregoing provisions shall apply only to that portion of such taxes which is due for the part of such tax year which falls within the period of Federal control.

(4) That the owner shall pay from his own funds all other taxes, including the taxes under Titles I and II of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1917, or any act in addition thereto or in amendment thereof.

(5) That the owner shall be bound by all the terms and conditions of this act and by any regulation or order made by or through the President under authority of this act or of that portion of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916, which authorizes the President in time of war to take possession, assume control, and utilize systems of transportation; and that, in case of failure to observe such terms and conditions or such regulations or orders, any further payments under the agreement may be suspended or forfeited.

(6) That the owner shall accept the agreement and the performance thereof as just compensation for all property taken by reason of Federal control.

(7) That the President is further authorized in such agreement to make all other reasonable provisions not inconsistent with the provisions of this act or of that portion of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916, which authorizes the President in time of war to take possession, assume control, and utilize systems of transportation that he may deem necessary or proper for such Federal control or for the determination of the mutual rights and obligations of the parties to the agreement arising from or out of such Federal control.

(8) If the President finds in the case of any railroad or system of transportation (a) that no dividends were paid during the period of three years ended June 30, 1917, and (b) that during all or a substantial portion of such period the condition of such railroad or system was so exceptional as to make the average annual railway operating income plainly inequitable as one of the elements of just compensation, and (c) that such exceptional condition was caused by nonoperation or receivership, or by the fact that recent expenditures for additions, betterments, road extensions, or equipment were not fully reflected in the railway operating income during such period or a substantial portion thereof, or by other undeveloped or abnormal conditions, then the President may, in lieu of so much of the annual sum payable under clause (a) of subdivision (1) as represents the annual average railway operating income from such railroad or system, substitute such amount as he finds just.

(9) The President is further authorized to make in such agreement all reasonable provisions for the maintenance, repair, and renewals of the property, for the depreciation thereof, and for the creation of necessary reserve funds in connection therewith, to the end that at the termination of Federal control the railroad or system of transportation shall be returned to the person, corporation, partnership, or association then entitled to the possession, use, and control thereof, in substantially as good repair and in substantially as complete equipment as at the beginning of Federal control, and that all just and proper accounting and adjustments be made, due consideration being given to the standards of maintenance and depreciation used in connection with such railroad or system during the three years ended June 30, 1917, and to the condition of the property at the beginning and at the end of Federal control.

SEC. 4. That if no agreement is made under section 3 the President may nevertheless pay in reasonable installments to the owner of any railroad or system of transportation under Federal control an annual sum during the period of Federal control not exceeding 90 per cent of the estimated annual amount of just compensation, and any balance claimed shall be determined as provided in section 5. The estimated annual amount of just compensation in the case of an owner with whom the President is authorized to agree, under section 3, shall not exceed the annual amount which he is authorized under that section to agree that the owner shall receive.

The acceptance of any benefits under this section shall constitute an acceptance by the owner of all the provisions of this act and shall obligate the owner to pay to the United States, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from a date or dates fixed in proceedings under section 5, the amount by which the sums received under this section exceed the sum found due in such proceedings.

SEC. 5. That if no agreement is made all claims for just compensation shall, on the application of the President or of any owner, be submitted to boards, each consisting of three referees to be appointed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, members of which and the official force thereof being eligible for service on such boards without additional compensation.

Such board of referees are hereby authorized to summon witnesses, require the production of records, books, correspondence, documents, and other papers, view properties, administer oaths, and may hold hearings in Washington and elsewhere, as their duties and the convenience of the parties may require. In case of disobedience to a subpœna the board may invoke the aid of any district court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence, and such court within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any person, corporation, partnership, or association, issue an order requiring appearance before the board, or the production of documentary evidence if so ordered, or the giving of evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

Such cases may be heard separately or together or by classes, as the Interstate Commerce Commission or any board of referees to which any such cases shall be referred may determine. Such boards shall give full hearings to such owners and to the United States, shall consider all the facts and circumstances, and shall report as soon as practicable in each case to the President the just compensation, calculated on an annual basis, and otherwise in such form as to be convenient and available for the making of such an agreement as is authorized in section 3.

The President is authorized to enter into an agreement with such owner for just compensation upon a basis not in excess of that reported by such board and may include therein provisions similar to those authorized in section 3.

Failing such agreement, either the United States or such owner may file a petition in the Court of Claims for the purpose of ascertainment of the amount of such just compensation, and in the proceedings in such court the report of the referees shall be prima facie evidence of the amount of just compensation and of the facts therein stated.

The Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to render its award in such form as it may deem proper and to provide for the reopening of its award and for the award of such further compensation as may be found due because of conditions arising after the making of the original award.

SEC. 6. That if no agreement is made under section 3 the United States nevertheless pledges itself to maintain each railroad or system of transportation in such manner that at the termination of Federal control thereof such railroad or system will be turned over to the person, corporation, partnership, or association then entitled to the possession, use, and control thereof in substantially as good physical condition as at the beginning of Federal control thereof. The amount of any loss sustained by any failure to carry out such pledge shall be determined by agreement with the President or, failing such agreement, in the manner provided in section 5, and shall be paid out of the revolving fund created by this act.

SEC. 7. That the sum of $500,000,000, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and any funds covered into the Treasury under section 14 are hereby permanently appropriated for use by the President as a revolving fund for the payment of the just compensation agreed upon or found due by the Court of Claims, under section 3 or 5, for other purposes specified in this act. If the amount so appropriated proves insufficient for the payment of just compensation, the United States hereby pledges itself to appropriate such sum as may be necessary for such purpose.

SEC. 8. That the President may expend from the revolving fund such amounts as he may deem necessary or desirable—

(a) To provide motive power, cars, and other necessary equipment, which shall be used and accounted for as the President may direct and disposed of as Congress may hereafter by law provide;

(b) To make on or in connection with any railroad or system of transportation any additions, betterments, or road extensions necessary or desirable for war purposes or in the public interest;

(c) For the utilization and operation of canals or for the purchase, construction, utilization, or operation of boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities on the inland and coastwise waterways, and in the operation and use of such facilities he may create or employ such agencies and enter into such contracts and agreements as he deems proper in the public interest.

SEC. 9. That the President during the period of Federal control may on or in connection with any railroad or system of transportation order the owner to make any additions, betterments, or road extensions necessary or desirable for war purposes or in the public interest. He may advance from the revolving fund all or any part of the expense of such additions, betterments, and road extensions, such advances to bear interest at such rate and be payable in such manner and on such terms as may be determined by the President, to the end that the United States may be fully reimbursed for the amount of such advances.

SEC. 10. That if, in proceedings under section 5, neither the award of the Court of Claims nor the agreement makes provision therefor, the President may nevertheless pay, if he deems it just, out of the revolving fund during the period of Federal control to the owner an annual sum equivalent to a fair percentage upon the cost of additions and betterments, less retirements and road extensions, made on or in connection with any railroad or system of transportation during the period of Federal control by the owner, with the approval or by the order of the President out of funds other than surplus earned, or earnings from investments, during the period of Federal control, plus a fair percentage upon the amount expended by the owner during the period of Federal control for taxes chargeable under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917, to investment in road and equipment and for assessments for public improvements.

Such fair percentage in the case of expenditures made out of borrowed money shall be equal to the rate at which such money is borrowed, and in other cases shall be fixed by the President at the time the expenditure is made. The cost of such additions, betterments, and road extensions, the amount of such retirements, and the amounts expended for such taxes and assessments shall be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission and certified by it to the President. The amount so certified shall be conclusive.

SEC. 11. That if, in proceedings under section 5, neither the award of the Court of Claims nor the agreement makes provision therefor, the President may nevertheless pay, if he deems it just, out of the revolving fund (to the owner of any railroad or system of transportation or to any person, corporation, partnership, or association who at the termination of Federal control of such railroad or system is or will become by reason of rights existing at such time entitled to the possession, use, and control thereof) any loss accruing by reason of any additions, betterments, or road extensions on or in connection with such railroad or system of transportation made during the period of Federal control by the President or made during such period by the owner at the order or with the approval of the President.

SEC. 12. That during the period of Federal control no owner of a railroad or system of transportation shall, without the prior approval of the President, declare or pay any dividend in excess of the average rate of dividends paid during the three years ending June 30, 1917, by the person, corporation, partnership, or association then entitled to the possession, use, and control of such railroad or system.

SEC. 13. That an owner may, during the period of Federal control, issue only such bonds, notes, equipment trust certificates, stock, and other forms of securities, secured or unsecured by mortgage, as the President may approve as consistent with the public interest. The President may, out of the revolving fund, purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities at prices not exceeding par, and thereafter any securities so purchased shall be held by the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, under the direction of the President, represent the United States in all matters in connection therewith in the same manner as a private security holder. Any income from such securities shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The President may direct that such securities or any portion thereof be sold whenever in his judgment it is desirable, at prices not less than the cost thereof, and the proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 14. That moneys and other property derived from the operation of the railroads or systems of transportation during Federal control are hereby declared to be the property of the United States. Unless otherwise directed by the President such moneys shall not be covered into the Treasury, but such moneys and property shall remain in the custody of the same officers and the accounting thereof shall be in the same manner and form as before Federal control. Disbursements therefrom shall, without further appropriation, be made in the same manner as before Federal control, and for such purposes as under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917, are chargeable to operating expenses or to railway tax accruals, and for such other purposes in connection with Federal control as the President may direct, except that taxes under Titles I and II of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1917, or any act in addition thereto or in amendment thereof, shall be paid by the owner out of his own funds. If Federal control begins or ends during the tax year for which any taxes so chargeable to railway tax accruals are assessed, the taxes for such year shall be apportioned to the date of the beginning or ending of such Federal control and disbursements shall be made only for that portion of such taxes as is due for the part of such tax year which falls within the period of Federal control.

Such custody and disbursement shall, however, be subject to the direction of the President, and all officers and employees having custody or control of any of such moneys or property shall be subject to all criminal laws regarding the custody and control of public moneys or property so far as not inconsistent herewith.

At such periods as the President may direct the books shall be closed and the balance of revenues over disbursements shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the revolving fund created by this act. If such revenues are insufficient to meet such disbursements the deficit shall be paid paid out of such revolving fund in such manner as the President may direct.

SEC. 15. That the President may execute any of the powers herein and heretofore granted him with relation to Federal control through such agencies as he may determine and may fix the reasonable compensation for the performance of services in connection therewith; and may utilize the personnel and facilities of the Interstate Commerce Commission and call upon members of such commission, or any of its employees, or employees of any department of the Government for such services as he may deem expedient. No such Federal official or employee shall receive any additional compensation for such services.

SEC. 16. That all persons performing service, on or in connection with a railroad or system of transportation under Federal control, of such a character that, but for Federal control, all or a portion of their compensation would under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917, be chargeable to operating expenses, are hereby declared to be, during the period of Federal control or such portion thereof as they remain in such service, in the service of the United States, subject to the following limitations:

(a) They shall not be considered as officers or employees under the United States for the purpose of Title II of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1917, commonly called "war excess profits tax";

(b) They shall not be considered civil employees of the United States within the meaning of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916;

(c) The President may by general or special order prescribe what, if any, statutes of the United States, or orders made thereunder (other than the act entitled "An act relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases," approved April 22, 1908, and amendments thereto), shall be inapplicable to such persons or any class thereof;

(d) Nothing in this section shall apply to persons otherwise in the Government service who are utilized or called upon for services under the provisions of section 15.

SEC. 17. That during the period of Federal control any suit or proceeding (of such a character that but for Federal control it could be brought against the owner of any railroad or system of transportation and any amount paid in compromise thereof or in satisfaction of a judgment or decree therein charged to operating expenses or to railway tax accruals under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force on Dec. 27, 1917), may, except as otherwise provided in this act, be instituted against the United States in any court or tribunal which would have jurisdiction of such suit or proceeding but for Federal control, and process therein may be served on the same persons and in the same manner as would be proper but for Federal control, and subsequent proceedings shall be the same as would be proper but for Federal control.

No process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property under Federal control, or, in connection with any suit or proceeding that may properly be brought against the United States under this section, against any property belonging to the owner of a railroad or system of transportation; but the President shall, by regulation, provide for the payment out of the operating revenue derived from Federal control or, if that is insufficient, out of the revolving fund of any judgments or awards, and for the enforcement of any decrees or orders that may be rendered against the United States in any such suit or proceeding.

SEC. 18. That except as otherwise provided in this act the operating accounts and business shall be continued as in a going concern, so that operating accounts and claims, which have been deferred in the ordinary course of railroad business and which are not paid at the beginning of Federal control of a railroad or system of transportation and which are of a character properly chargeable to operating expenses, shall be paid out of operating income or out of the revolving fund; and on the surrender of such railroad or system of transportation it shall be returned subject to any operating accounts and claims that may be unpaid, if such accounts and claims have been deferred in the ordinary course of railroad business.

SEC. 19. That all statutes and regulations of the United States or for the District of Columbia in force on December 27, 1917, in relation to railroads or systems of transportation, or to their owners or the officers and employees of such owners in connection with the operation thereof, shall, for the purposes of Federal control and so far as is not inconsistent therewith or with this act, be read as if the United States and its agents during the period of Federal control were by the terms of such statutes and regulations expressly subject thereto. The President may from time to time by general or special order specify, as inconsistent with Federal control or any part thereof, any such statute or regulation or part thereof, except the act entitled "An act relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases," approved April 22, 1908, and amendments thereto. In any cause of action against the United States, or any civil or criminal liability of any person, based on any such statute or regulation, hereafter arises before the making of such order, the President may direct that such order or any part thereof be retroactive, and in such event the consent in this act given by the United States to be sued shall for the purpose of such cause of action be withdrawn, and such civil or criminal liability shall no longer exist.

SEC. 20. That the law of each State, statutory or other, in force on December 27, 1917, in relation to railroads or systems of transportation, or to their owners or the officers and employees of such owners in connection with the operation thereof, is hereby, for the purposes of Federal control and so far as is not inconsistent therewith or with this act, made a part of this act and applicable to the United States or its agents operating such railroads or systems of transportation within the jurisdiction of such State. The President may from time to time by general or special order, specify, as inconsistent with Federal control or any part thereof, any portion of such law, except the law relating to contracts, and except that portion of the law regulating the liability for personal injuries to or death of passengers, employees, or other persons, which does not impose liability for breach of a statute or order regulating the health, comfort, or safety of passengers, employees, or other persons. If any cause of action against the United States, or any civil or criminal liability of any person, based on such law, hereafter arises before the making of such order the President may direct that such order or any part thereof be retroactive, and in such event the consent in this act given by the United States to be sued shall for the purpose of such cause of action be withdrawn, and such civil or criminal liability shall no longer exist.

SEC. 21. That, during the period of Federal control, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires, the President may initiate rates, fares, charges, or classifications in relation to any railroad or system of transportation under Federal control, by filing the same with the Interstate Commerce Commission. Such rates, fares, charges, and classifications shall be fair, reasonable, and just, and shall take effect at such time and upon such notice as he may direct, but the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, upon complaint, enter upon a hearing concerning the fairness, justness, and reasonableness of so much of any order of the President as establishes or changes any such rate, fare, charge, or classification, and may consider all the facts and circumstances existing at the time of the making of such order. After full hearing, the commission may make such findings and orders as are authorized by the act to regulate commerce, as amended and supplemented, in the same manner as if the railroads or systems of transportation affected by such rate, fare, charge, or classification were being operated by the owners thereof; and for such purpose the act to regulate commerce, as amended and supplemented, shall be read as if the United States or its agents operating such railroad or systems were by the terms thereof expressly subject thereto.

SEC. 22. That all pending cases in the courts of the United States affecting railroads or other transportation systems brought under the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended and supplemented, including the commodities clause, so called, or under the act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, approved July 2, 1890, and amendments thereto, shall proceed to final judgment as soon as may be, as if the United States had not assumed control of transportation systems; but in any such case the court having jurisdiction may, upon the application of the United States, stay execution of final judgment until the further action of Congress in respect of control of transportation systems by the United States.

SEC. 23. That the Federal control of railroads and transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall not continue longer than 18 months after the proclamation of peace terminating the war in which the United States is now engaged: Provided, however, That the President may, prior to July 1, 1918, relinquish control of all or any part of any railroad or system of transportation further Federal control of which the President shall deem not needful or desirable; and the President may, at any time during the period of Federal control, agree with the owners to relinquish all or any part of any railroad or system of transportation: Provided further, That the President may relinquish all railroads under Federal control at any time he shall deem such action needful or desirable. No right to compensation shall accrue to any owner from and after the date of relinquishment for property relinquished under authority of this section.

SEC. 24. That this act is expressly declared to be emergency legislation enacted to meet conditions growing out of war; and nothing herein is to be construed as expressing or prejudicing the future policy of the Federal Government concerning the ownership, control, or regulation of carriers or the method or basis of the capitalization thereof.

SEC. 25. That whoever knowingly violates this act, or knowingly interferes with or impedes the possession, use, operation, or control of any railroad property, railroad, or transportation system hitherto or hereafter taken over by the President, or knowingly violates any order or regulation made in pursuance of this act, or of any other act concerning such possession, use, operation, or control, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. Prosecutions shall be in the district courts of the United States, under the direction of the Attorney General, in accordance with the procedure for the collection and imposing of fines and penalties now existing in such courts.

SEC. 26. That if any provision of this act or the application of such provision to certain circumstances is held unconstitutional the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to circumstances other than those as to which it has been held unconstitutional shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, some of the amendments which I have proposed have already been adopted by the committee. Senators who were opposed to my substitute voted for those amendments; but some of the most serious matters connected with the Senate bill have not been corrected, like the compensation which comes from an electric road that is a part of a steam railroad system and like the determination of retirements, no provision having been made for ascertaining their value, which will amount to millions of dollars. The provision relative to taxes is obscure. There is no Senator who can read it and understand exactly what is meant. It will afford a fertile field for litigation. "Standard return" still remains as a misnomer. The unconstitutional provision which fixes the rate of interest which a court must find ere a judgment is not eliminated; and this is similarly true of the prohibition denying to owners the right to dispose of the compensation they receive as they desire.

Now, Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the Senate. I tried to get my views before this body; and having offered this substitute, which will be printed, I am not going even to ask that it be read again, but that a vote be had upon it; and I would like the yeas and nays for the RECORD.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I want to put this in the RECORD.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I have order?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have been obliged to suspend, but I do not yield.

Mr. President, I have offered the substitute in good faith. It will be printed in the RECORD, and hereafter, when disputes arise under the law, Senators may possibly have occasion to refer to it to determine whether the suggestions that I have made, the offered amendments, were captious or whether they were of the very essence of clear legislation on a matter of the utmost importance to the country.

I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the request seconded? [A pause.] It is.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to proceed with reading this very interesting speech.

"Just one thing was changed, and the conclusion is therefore irresistible that this one changed condition produced the results which have been stated.

"Frankfort is situated upon a little river, the original condition of which I have heard described as being 'too much dried up in summer, frozen up in winter, and flooded in the spring, to be of any account for navigation.'

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not yield to the Senator, as I have only five minutes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article or speech which the Senator is reading be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has five minutes. Let him proceed.

Mr. RANSDELL (reading)—

"However, a few small boats, drawn by horses, occasionally came up to the city. But in October, 1886, the river as far as Frankfort was given a dependable channel 8 feet 3 inches deep and then things began to happen.

"The German Government, when it agrees to improve a waterway, compels the cities along that waterway to build harbors so that the channel can be used. Frankfort, from 1883 to 1886, spent $1,750,000 on a harbor, and one indication as to the effect of the improved river upon the city's growth is given by the fact that when the war broke out they were at work upon a new harbor, the estimated cost of which was nearly $18,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, there is so much disorder that we can not hear the Senator.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am speaking loud enough to be heard if order is kept in the Senate. [Reading:]

"Talking some time ago with a gentleman who was born on the banks of the Main, and who still has the accents of the fatherland upon his tongue, he said to me, 'I make two visits, 12 years apart, one before, one after, the river was improved; und now my frendts think I lie ven I say dere are schmoke-stacks all der vay from Frankfort to der Rhine.' But he was telling the literal truth.

"There is a railroad running along each bank of the Main all the way down to the Rhine. What happened to them? Did their business fall off? Did they go into the hands of receivers or anything like that? On the contrary, their business began to grow by leaps and bounds, and at the time the war broke out they were handling almost four times as much tonnage as they hauled when they had a practical monopoly of the business of Frankfort.

"And that is not all; it is only the beginning. Formerly Frankfort had little to sell and much to buy. The cars and such boats as came at all came in loaded and went back empty. With the development of commerce and industry, Frankfort had also much to sell, and cars and boats went loaded in both directions. Thus the traffic was not only quadrupled in quantity but equalized in direction, and every traffic man present knows what an advantage that is.

"Nor is that all, or even the best of it. The traffic was not only increased in volume and equalized in direction, but it was raised in grade. It could afford to pay, and did pay, a very much higher rate, and in addition to all else, with the growth of population and prosperity, there was a great increase in the passenger traffic. Following the improvement of the Main, the Prussian railway administration found it necessary to spend $11,000,000 for increased terminal facilities in order to take care of the traffic which the river created and brought to the railway.

"A striking instance of the dominating influence which cost of transportation exercises over foreign trade is to be found in the report of the British Royal Commission on Waterways. The sworn testimony of a manufacturer in the Midland district of England, located only 85 miles from a first-class port and 105 miles from London by rail, declares that he has not only been beaten in the markets of the world, which he once dominated in his line, but actually driven from the capital of his own country by manufacturers in Frankfort and Mannheim, in the heart of Germany, 500 miles farther away—but with water transportation available all the way.

"Improved waterways tend to develop resources and industry widely throughout a country, while sole dependence upon a costlier form of transportation tends to concentrate manufacturing upon and near the seaboard. Manchester, England, in the early eighties, was a dying city. Five thousand dwelling houses were tenantless, hundreds of warehouses were vacant, and factories by the score were closing their doors or moving to the coast. A dozen years later a marvelous transformation had been wrought. The 5,000 dwelling houses had been reoccupied and 20,000 new ones had been built and were occupied; all the vacant warehouses and hundreds of new ones were teeming with business; and factories, both old and new, some of the latter being among the largest in England, were humming with industry. The disease which was threatening to destroy the life of the city was costly transportation, and the remedy, which wrought the wonderful change that has been outlined, was the building of a ship canal.

"Liverpool and the railroads leading from that city to Manchester fought with the energy of despair against the building of this canal, thinking that their business would be destroyed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Louisiana has expired.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, in the nature of a substitute, on which the yeas and nays have been requested and ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I announce the same pair as before with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], and transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HALE. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FERNALD]. If present he would vote "nay."

So Mr. TOWNSEND's amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after the word "waterways" in line 14, page 9, the words:

Including provisions for the interchange of traffic between water and rail carriers.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I will continue to read this article:

"But what happened? Although Liverpool, in the effort to retain the business built up through generations of effort and the expenditure of vast sums of money, made repeated reductions in dock charges, the revenues of the Mersey Docks and Harbor Board increased five times as much during the 13 years following the opening of the canal as they had done during the same number of years before. The 7,000,000 tons of traffic developed at Manchester was not stolen from Liverpool; it was created anew. And, incidentally, every railroad leading to Manchester from Liverpool has had to increase its trackage and its terminals three and four times over in order to accommodate the enlarged traffic which the canal has produced.

"If Manchester could not compete with Liverpool when it was only 50 miles from the sea, how in heaven's name can cities in the interior of the United States, a thousand miles or more from tidewater, hope to develop a foreign trade or retain that which they may have now in competition with cities on and near the coast? And if there be anyone, here or elsewhere, who thinks it might be well for the coast cities if manufactures and population should move to them from the interior, let me ask him one question: Have New York, Boston, New Orleans, and the other cities on the coast grown rich and great in spite of the development of the interior or because of it?

"It is my conviction that unless the waterways are improved and used the opening of the Panama Canal will be one of the greatest disasters that ever happened to the Mississippi Valley. And it is impossible that dry rot should disintegrate the industry and creeping paralysis destroy the commerce of the heart of the country without working disaster to the port cities upon our seaboard.

"It is unsafe to go very far in prophesying how the present war will end or what its results will be. But one thing seems to me to be beyond all question, and that is that when peace comes again the competition for foreign trade will be far more intense than it has ever been before. It is true that many workers have been killed and disabled, but the warring countries have discovered that their women can do almost, if not quite, everything that their men have done. There will be, especially in Germany, a nationalization, perhaps even what might be called a militarization, of industry. Possibly by the impulsion of patriotism, if necessary by the compulsion of governmental power, labor will accept the lowest living wage, the manufacturer the smallest possible profit, and in every way cost of production will be reduced to the lowest possible point, until the foreign markets, which are absolutely necessary to national rehabilitation, shall have been regained.

"In view of what is to come, it is important to consider what has already come to pass. In every one of the 20 years ending with 1913, the foreign commerce of Germany has exceeded that of the United States, and the excess has been steadily growing greater. Divide the 20 years into four periods of 5 years each. In the first 5 years the foreign commerce of Germany exceeded that of the United States by an average of $207,000,000 per year. In the second 5 the excess was $221,000,000. In the third it was $400,000,000. In the fourth the average excess for each year was $712,000,000. For the single year 1912 it was $853,000,000. And for the whole 20 years it was $7,700,000,000.

"There is nothing in that record for the United States to be proud of, even if the two countries stood somewhere near on an equality. But we have an area more than seventeen times as great; we have 50 per cent more population; we have nearly three times the accumulated national wealth; and we have national resources greater by ten, possibly by twenty fold. If Mr. Farrell should ever find that a competing plant, covering only 10 acres, was doing far more business than one of the Steel Corporation, which covered 175 acres, and that the difference was getting greater every year, I feel absolutely certain that he would not wait 20 years before he found out the reason or reasons for such an astounding discrepancy.

"Now I frankly admit that I have 'water on the brain,' and I never expect to get over it, but I am not so completely a man of one idea that I attribute this startling difference solely to the transportation system of Germany, but I do attribute it mainly to that system."

I have a good deal of the same trouble myself, Mr. President, and I wish America could get water on the brain and use its waterways now, imitating the Germans to that extent.

"In 1905 Prussia passed a bill appropriating $80,500,000 for waterways. That German Kingdom had already spent $129,000,000 on waterways, and had $2,225,000,000 invested in State-owned railways.

"These figures are not insignificant, even when standing alone, but their full significance must be shown by a comparison. And if the United States had already invested nearly $60,000,000,000 in State-owned railways and had spent $3,465,000,000 on waterways, and should then pass a single rivers and harbors bill appropriating $2,160,000,000 more, it would then occupy the same position in regard to transportation that Prussia had reached 11 years ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I hope we will not have any more pro-German speeches in this debate.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish you would adopt the wise policy of Germany in respect to waterways.

Mr. TOWNSEND and others. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANSDELL. I send another amendment to the desk.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Louisiana may be allowed to insert the matter he is reading in the RECORD. We are only punishing ourselves. It is very evident that under our system of rules the Senator can keep us here all night if he thinks it necessary.

Mr. RANSDELL. Five minutes more will complete what I want especially to present to the Senate.

What the Germans think of waterways, how absolutely vital they are regarded——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I rise to ask a question. This is the Senate of the United States. I question whether this amendment is offered in good faith, and I raise the parliamentary question that when an amendment is not offered in good faith it ought to be ruled out of order.

Mr. RANSDELL. No man has a right to impugn my faith. The amendment is germane, and I will proceed now to finish the speech I have been reading.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let us have the amendment read.

Mr. RANSDELL. I beg pardon. It ought to have been read.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, at the end of line 17, insert:

Including terminal facilities and promoting the cooperation of railways and waterways.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana has not the floor. A motion to lay the amendment on the table is in order.

Mr. RANSDELL. How can that motion be made when I have the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to lay the amendment on the table is in order.

Mr. MYERS. I make the point of order that the Senator from Nebraska can not make that motion while the Senator who proposed the amendment has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. He did not have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He did not have the floor. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments in the Senate, the bill will be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. RANSDELL. Is the bill in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been.

Mr. RANSDELL. I reserve the right to offer in the Senate the amendment which I offered in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has passed to a third reading and no amendment can be offered save by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to discuss the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has five minutes for that purpose.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President—

"What the Germans think of waterways, how absolutely vital they are regarded under all conditions, is shown by the fact that even in the midst of the greatest war in all history, when the Empire is fighting for its very life, they are not only maintaining and operating the waterways they already have, but are actually building more. The great new waterway from the Oder to the Vistula, although not entirely finished, was opened to traffic in April of last year; the Rhine-Hanover Canal was finished in December; and Berlin, which had already spent $8,000,000 on a harbor in the eastern part of the city, has, since the war began, started and almost completed a harbor on its western borders, at a cost of more than $9,000,000. And yet there are people in the United States who gravely tell us that all work upon waterways must be suspended in order that we may have money to make a needed increase in our Army and Navy.

"The passage of time warns me that I must bring these remarks to a close. Improved waterways are of importance in connection with foreign trade, because they make possible the fullest development of natural resources; because they provide the cheapest form of transportation, both for the assemblage of raw materials and the shipment of finished products. I have given you an illustration of the tremendous difference in the cost of transportation by rail and by water, and it should be remembered, that, while money paid for a costly form of transportation, when a cheaper form is available or can be made available, undoubtedly benefits the transportation company to which it is paid, so far as the shipper is concerned it is just as much wasted as if it were burned up or thrown into the depths of the sea. On some of our largest rivers freight can be carried in fleets of barges at as low a cost as on the Great Lakes. It is interesting to note in passing that the greatest amount of cargo ever moved at one operation was not upon the Great Lakes, or even upon the high seas, but was on the Mississippi River, when the towboat Sprague brought 56,000 tons of coal to New Orleans at one time.

"While the possible saving on smaller waterways is not as great as on the Lakes or our largest rivers, it is still vast in the aggregate. To my mind the greatest economic waste in our country to-day, and one of the greatest handicaps in the extension of our foreign trade, arises from the fact that we have failed to follow the example of Germany and develop and use our waterways. There is very little, if any, sentiment in trade; the buyer in South America, in China, or anywhere else, will always take the goods which are cheaper in price while equal in quality, and it matters little or nothing at all to him in what country they were made.

"Sometimes figures are published to show how small a percentage of the selling price is due to transportation, but such figures as I have seen count only the freight on the finished product. This is a superficial view and leads to a false conclusion, for crude materials often go through many processes in different parts of the country. The finished product goes from factory to wholesaler, from wholesaler to jobber, and from jobber to retailer, before it reaches the consumer, and every time it moves from place to place it must bear a transportation cost. Besides, transportation affects the cost of the home in which the workman lives, of the food which he eats, and of the clothes which he wears, and what it costs the workman to live affects the wage which the manufacturer must pay, so the price of the finished product, when it reaches the consumer's hands, has been increased not merely once but possibly a score of times by the cost of transportation. It is evident, therefore, that the nation which has the lowest transportation cost has a tremendous advantage in the competition for foreign trade.

"As was well said by Mr. Vanderlip last evening, this body of men and the business men of the country whom you represent can control public opinion, and every consideration, from the loftiest patriotism to enlightened self-interest, demands that the business men of the United States should put their feet down hard on the senseless and slanderous charge of "pork barrel" and see to it that the Government of the United States immediately begins and continuously prosecutes the work of improving our rivers and harbors until we have a great, connected national system of waterways working in complete harmony and cooperation with our splendid system of railways and the magnificent system of highways which is already begun.

"Much is said in these days concerning national preparedness, and improved waterways promote national preparedness either for peace or war, for sustained military efficiency and continued commercial supremacy are both founded upon industrial development; industrial development depends upon cheap transportation, and the cheapest of all transportation is water transportation."

I thank the Senators for their patience and the attention which they have given me.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the Senator from Louisiana in having published these interesting remarks, but I want to direct the attention of the Senate to the fact that the rules of the Senate of the United States are ridiculous.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 3932) to provide for a determination of heirship in cases of deceased members of the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, and conferring authority on the courts of said States in reference thereto, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 3933) granting an increase of pension to Oakley Randall; and

A bill (S. 3934) granting an increase of pension to J. Forsyth Harrison; to the Committee on Pensions.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 70. Joint resolution authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of James Buchanan, a former President of the United States, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Library.

WAR EXCESS-PROFITS TAX REGULATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

House concurrent resolution 36.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed 350,000 copies of the war excess-profits tax regulations No. 41, 100,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 250,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, the same to be distributed through the folding rooms.

INCOME-TAX REGULATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m., Friday, February 22, 1918) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 25, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 22, 1918.

The House met at 11 o'clock.

The Rev. Charles Wood, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray. O Thou God of the loving heart and the open hand, Thou who art a living love that dost will the blessedness of others, we thank Thee to-day for Thy boundless benefactions to us as a people. Thou who hast led through countless centuries the stars and the suns across the boundless reaches of space, Thou didst graciously lead our fathers to this land. Thou didst protect and preserve them, and Thou hast guided us through all the vicissitudes of the centuries. God of our fathers, we pray that Thou wilt be our God. May we serve Thee and Thee only. Wilt Thou direct and control the deliberations of these Thy servants this day that their decisions may be not only for the welfare of this land of ours that we love, but of the whole world. Wilt Thou work so vitally through us as a people that there may come to the world now being wrecked by war a permanent peace. May the gates of cruelty be overthrown and may injustice and inhumanity be trampled under the indignant feet of men. And grant, we beseech Thee, that to-day, this anniversary day, as we look backward across the decades that have passed we may behold growing ever and ever more majestic the figure of our first President, and as millions will remember his life and services to-day may the prayer rise from their hearts that the same principles by which his life was swayed, the same purposes which he sought so determinedly, may become the principles and the purposes of all our citizens. We pray that Thou will bless our President and grant that whole-hearted and nonpartisan support may be given to him in these distressing days. And bless the officers and men of our Army and of our Navy, and grant that all who battle and all who serve here at home may know that in Thine own good time, speedily to please Thee, there shall come a victory in which the whole world shall rejoice. And to Thy name shall be the praise. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a special order for to-day.

The SPEAKER. Yes; 30 minutes are to be granted to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If it is agreeable to the gentleman to yield for a moment for me to make a unanimous-consent request before he begins, I desire to say it has been the custom for many years to have read upon this day from the Clerk's desk the Farewell Address of the first President of the United States, and I desire to ask unanimous consent, not to interfere with the existing order, that the gentleman from Louisiana be recognized to read Washington's Farewell Address.

The SPEAKER. Which gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Dr. ASWELL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent, as preparatory to the address by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] read Washington's Farewell Address. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, before that is done I wish to ask unanimous consent that the House meet next Monday at 11.30, for the reason that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has secured unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes upon that day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that on next Monday the House meet at 11.30.

Mr. ESCH. I think that request was subject to the possibility that the railroad bill might still be under consideration and run into Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman if he does not think the prospects are good for the railroad bill to run into Monday?

Mr. ESCH. I think they are very good.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, perhaps some others of us may have a different view, and I now desire to say that I am going to ask the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to remain in session until the bill has been disposed of in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ask that the previous question be ordered on the committee's report, and then it can go over until Monday for a vote.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman does not mean that he is not going to allow the amendments Members may desire to offer to be offered?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly not; but I want the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to remain in session until it disposes of all amendments.

Mr. GILLETT. There may not be time.

Mr. LENROOT. There will be 72 hours straight work if the gentleman undertakes that.

Mr. SIMS. That indicates the gentleman has a very long list of amendments.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly we have.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Tennessee making a request or a speech?

Mr. SIMS. I am giving notice.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, temporarily I shall object.

The SPEAKER. To the meeting at 11.30 on Monday?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes, sir.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following personal request.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Mr. LOUIS W. FAIRFIELD, of Indiana, begs to be excused Friday and Saturday, February 22 and 23.

Respectfully,

LOUIS W. FAIRFIELD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

RATIFICATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT WITH REFERENCE TO INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a communication from the governor of the State of South Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 19, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. CLARK: In accordance with the provisions of the joint resolution ratified by the South Carolina Legislature, I have the honor to transmit herewith a true copy of the said preamble and resolution. The title of the resolution is as follows:

"A joint resolution ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America prohibiting the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes, and to provide means for the enforcement thereof."

With high esteem and personal regards, I am

Cordially, yours,

RICHARD L. MANNING, Governor.

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] will read Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. ASWELL read the address, as follows:

To the people of the United States:

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you at the same time to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that in withdrawing the tender of service, which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness, but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this previous to the last election had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you, but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence impelled me to abandon the idea. I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed toward the organization and administration of the Government the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise and as an instructive example in our annals that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts and a guarantee of the plans by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that Heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free Constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained; that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States under the auspices of liberty may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which can not end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest. Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the Union of the whole.

The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common Government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in a like intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one Nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength, or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined can not fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter. Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heartburnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head; they have seen, in the negotiation by the Executive and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the General Government and in the Atlantic States, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, toward confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This Government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and actions of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the Nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Toward the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion; and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind—which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight—the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms, kindles the animosity of one part against another, foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates, but let there be no change by usurpation, for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, Where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principles.

It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric? Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind that toward the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object—which is always a choice of difficulties—ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur.

Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty, of nations has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak toward a great and powerful nation dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens), the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim not less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But, in my opinion, it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony and a liberal intercourse with all nations are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand, neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things, diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our Nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations; but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism, this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both Houses of Congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance, and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without anything more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity toward other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love toward it which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations, I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking in the midst of my fellow citizens the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

GO: WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, 17th September, 1796.

[Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WALSH. To make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the point.

OMNIBUS PENSION BILL.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the omnibus pension bill, H. R. 10027, follow immediately the conclusion of the consideration of the present railroad bill now under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the pension bill follow immediately after the passage of the pending bill, if it ever passes. [Laughter.] Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, what is the request?

The SPEAKER. That the omnibus pension bill follow immediately the passage of the pending bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will that interfere with District day on next Monday?

The SPEAKER. If it happens to come on next Monday, it would.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I shall be compelled to object, Mr. Speaker. I do not object if it comes up now.

The SPEAKER. He is not asking for it to come up now. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will make his request subject to noninterference with the District of Columbia day, I will not object. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman qualifies his request to that extent.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I will do that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] requests that the pension bill, H. R. 10027, follow immediately after the conclusion of the railroad bill, not to interfere, however, with the District of Columbia business.

The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] a question. Is that the same bill they had up here the other day?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD].

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I did not catch it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman wants to consider this pension bill as soon as this other one is out of the way.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is all right. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, in 1889, 100 years after the inauguration of Washington as our first President, a symposium of the leading thinkers of the world was published of the opinions concerning him.

Of the opinions that were offered I want to read three. The first is from Louis Philippe, Compte de Paris, giving the French opinion:

I admire him still more now since I have seen how republican institutions are understood and practiced in France.

I want to read a British opinion, from probably the greatest British mind of English history, W. E. Gladstone:

All I can say is that I look upon Washington among great and good men, as one peculiarly good and great, and that he has been to me for more than 40 years a light upon the path of life.

I want to read an opinion of the central powers, coming from the great fugitive, Louis Kossuth, who came to America in 1852 to find shelter from the persecution in Austria-Hungary. Writing from Turin, Italy, where at the age of 87 he was living in retirement, away from the country he loved, and referring to our Government which Washington inaugurated, he says:

That stupendous incarnation of pure democratic principle which has the providential mission to guide the future ages of mankind on the road of infinite progress.

These opinions are in keeping with that of the great English historian, Edward A. Freeman, who expressed his appreciation in this sentiment:

Washington, the expander of England.

It might seem presumptuous for a Member of this House in this year of 1918, so far removed from the days since he lived and labored, to undertake to throw a new light upon the life of this great man, but I would like to view him from at least a new angle and to have your attention to three episodes in his life from which we can study his influence in the shaping of modern government. His reputation is safe, and his place in history as a warrior is common knowledge; his rank as a citizen is as familiar as our own childhood, while his place as our first great citizen from every angle of estimate is assured. But I wish to see him now in his influence in shaping modern government as witnessed from three events in his life.

The first episode is when he saved the State of Franklin, that portion of western North Carolina now known as Tennessee, from taking the dangerous step of secession in 1784 by joining the foreign power of Spain, which then owned the Mississippi country, in order to get the free outlet of the Mississippi River; and thereby, through the influence of Washington, who prevented it, the dangerous experiment of secession was defeated even before the Nation was born.

The second episode is as the president of the Constitutional Convention, a group of men 56 in number, most of whom had served in the second Continental Congress, about which William Pitt, standing under the corridors of the House of Commons, declared that "for solidity of reasoning, wisdom of conclusion, and force of sagacity that body of men has never been excelled in the history of the world." Washington, as the presiding officer of that great body of men, exercised such supreme influence and thereby contributed to the history of modern government in the world, I think, its greatest contribution, in the form of our Federal Constitution.

The third episode in his life to which I will refer is when called by unanimous consent to inaugurate the fundamental principles as written, first, in the Declaration of Independence and, second, in the Constitution of the United States in practical government as he inaugurated them in 1789. Briefly, I must look at these episodes, in order to throw light upon Washington's far-reaching influence, and also to aid in interpreting the present time and, if possible, predicate the future, if we may.

In 1784 the people of western North Carolina, shut off from their kin on the Atlantic seaboard by the mountains, had no possible way to purchase the things they needed, that they could not produce, except to do it through the mouth of the Mississippi River. Spain held control of this outlet and laid a heavy tribute upon all who wanted to trade. The Government was appealed to for relief, and John Jay was sent to effect a treaty. The best he could do was to agree to a close of the mouth of the Mississippi for 25 years, after which it was to be opened to these people. The people of western North Carolina, resenting what appeared a total lack of regard for justice to them on the part of the Government, took steps for relief and erected a separate State, elected John Sevier as governor, proceeded to elect an independent legislature, and made overtures to Spain to join her. Here is the earliest step toward the dangerous experiment of secession employed later on in 1861, which precipitated the Civil War. Washington was the only figure that seemed to have comprehended the danger.

He saw the possibilities of the great Mississippi Valley if permitted to develop uninterruptedly and not be prevented by any portion joining a foreign power. He wrote a letter to Thomas Jefferson and another to Gov. Harrison, of Virginia, setting out the possibilities of uniting the interior of the country with the seaboard States, and to this end he recommended the appointment of a committee to report a mode of canal building, aided by a system of fordage, to carry the goods from the headwaters of the Ohio to the headwaters of the Potomac, thereby making a trade route from the Atlantic, through the Potomac, via canal to the Ohio, thence Mississippi to Gulf. Quite naturally when he recommended this possibility, objections were offered as to finance and other items of expense. Washington replied with his wonderful comprehension of what the Mississippi Valley was yet to be. His recommendations in numerous letters are most illuminating on these possibilities. And I want to say to this Membership that I believe that Washington had a clear comprehension of this undeveloped empire in the Mississippi Valley, although it was but a wild waste of country and in certain parts a trackless wilderness. While it is true that a committee was appointed and a meeting was held at Mount Vernon, adjourned to Alexandria, to recommend the construction of this inland water route; while it is true that it did not result in actual construction, yet it removed the opposition of the people of western North Carolina, who later on rescinded their action, with the important result that instead of the State of Franklin leaving to join Spain we now have the splendid sovereign State of Tennessee. And a great contribution, one of the first and most important of the first President of the country, not recognized generally, at least in its bearing upon the future of the new Republic soon to be born, was the making it impossible to set the precedent for any portion of the United States breaking off, either to join its friendly neighbors or to cast its lot with a foreign country. That was in 1784, one year after the treaty which closed the Revolutionary War and three years before the Constitutional Convention.

In 1787 Washington, by unanimous consent, presided over the Constitutional Convention. As the responsible head of the Army, he was the closest observer of lack of power and suffered most from that lack. He saw great problems. The first and greatest problem was to cure the weakness of the old confederation, which afforded neither executive nor judicial power. This at once raised the question whether the Government was to be a Government of the people of the States, without regard to State lines, or a Government of the States. In other words, was it to be a National or a Federal Government? Everyone will recognize, who is at all familiar with the critical period of the United States, that the early contest had been in favor of the States, and the Articles of Confederation were a "mere league of friendship," a group of sovereign States, each State maintaining its sovereignty. Each State could also withdraw its representation, and thus defeat all legislation from want of a quorum, since they voted by States, three-fourths of which were necessary for all important measures.

Washington, as the leader of the Revolutionary War, had recognized the need of power beyond mere recommendation, and when he came to preside over this convention, and the struggle came on as to whether it was to be a government of the people or a government of the States as States, he was clear-headed as to the danger of the latter. And yet he was equally clear-headed as to the danger of the former if unrestricted. If the new proposal was to remain a league of friendship without coercive power to operate on the individual State the weakness so apparent would not be cured. In the midst of a bitter contest on a disputed point a member, it is said, entirely disgusted with the failure to reach a conclusion after a three weeks' debate, arose and made a motion that the convention adjourn. Washington, not having spoken up to this time, saw the danger. When the member—I think it was Mr. Dayton—made the statement, "We have been here now for three weeks behind closed doors, and the thing for us to do is to adjourn and go home," Gen. Washington arose, and tradition says that he made this speech, that ought to be written in letters of gold and posted on the doorposts of every lover of representative government:

It is too probable that no plan we here propose will be adopted. Perhaps another dreadful conflict is to be sustained. If to please the people we offer what we ourselves disapprove, how can we afterwards defend our work? Let us raise the standard so high that all the good can repair to it. This is not the work of man. The hand of God is in this thing.

He requested that the motion for adjournment be withdrawn, and it was withdrawn.

And I pause long enough to ask the question, What would have been the future of the American Government if George Washington's powerful and overtowering moral greatness had not been sufficient to have settled the difficulty and thus prevented the motion for adjournment being voted upon? It was vastly more serious than when after a similar conflict a compromise was reached through the suggestion and adoption of two Houses to satisfy both States and people, the former in the Senate and the latter in the House. Mr. Speaker, during the months from May 14 to September 17 that great figure presided with deliberation and power over the most discordant group of men representing the farthest extremes of political theory in the history of government. A less powerful personality could not have held in counsel such great lights, so variant in their dogmas and so persistent in their theories. When we undertake to estimate his power it is found not in the theories of Alexander Hamilton, one of the leading figures of his day and the closest adviser of Washington as well as a leader of the Constitutional Convention, then but 30 years of age, the most original thinker in the group; nor is it found in the theories of Thomas Jefferson, who, by the way, was not in the convention, but his representative, James Madison, was there. His greatness will be found not in the theories of these men, but in the power of the presiding officer big enough to see all sides of a question and powerful enough to hold and direct the tremendous forces still in deliberation until they, through a wise spirit of counsel, were able to work out a system of government which William E. Gladstone in 1878 pronounced the greatest instrument ever stricken off by the brain or purpose of man at any one time.

That instrument, fellow Members of this House, adopted in 1789, 130 years ago, by 3,000,000 people, has gone through the fires of civil war, as well as three foreign wars, and has come to the place where now 110,000,000 people have come to look upon it as the organic law, during which time the Nation has become the most powerful in wealth, twice over, of any country in the world.

And hear me: During all these years the instrument has not been organically changed but four times, which fact beyond all others indicates the keen foresight of the body of men presided over by Washington. It is true there are 17 amendments, but the first 10, the bill of rights, were originally agreed upon by the convention, and the eleventh, to exempt a State from being made a defendant by an individual, an exemption which the fathers thought they had included until a State was actually sued, was to correct the error. The twelfth was the first modification. The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth all grew out of the Civil War, and for our purpose would stand as one modification of the organic law. The other two are changes, it is true, from the original agreement when judged according to the opinions of the members of the convention. When we think of the blessings that have flown out of that marvelous instrument we can not attribute it to any one man so greatly as to the head of the convention, who held the membership together and maintained deliberation. Out of the diversity of political acumen, attenuated and discordant, there came through this sublime figure the instrument filled with the wisest of sanction and remarkably free of dangerous dogma. [Applause.]

The next episode in the life of Gen. Washington to which I wish your attention was when as our first President he inaugurated the principles fundamental in our Government and started the Nation on the right road. Fellow Members of the House, I want sympathetic attention here. Washington knew the fundamental principles of Jefferson. Washington knew that Jefferson was the greatest exponent of liberty in government the world had ever seen. [Applause.] Washington knew that the very lifeblood of this new idea in government, expressing itself in the right of local self-government, had never such a representative in the history of the world as Thomas Jefferson.

If I wanted Jefferson's own opinion of the work he had done which he wanted to be attached to his memory, having spent 39 years in office out of his more than 60 years of public life, I would take you to his tomb and would read upon it the epitaph that he himself wrote:

Here was buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of American Independence, of the statute of Virginia's religious freedom, and father of the University of Virginia.

His 39 years of public life comprehended a service in the Virginia House of Burgesses, service in the Virginia Assembly, service in the Second Continental Congress, four years' service as governor of Virginia, four years' service as Vice President of the Nation, service as Secretary of State from 1789 to 1794, and service for two terms as President of the United States, to say nothing of his service as a foreign minister. And yet in all this array of high and outstanding service in the Nation he picks out three items, only one of which would you select as a thing for which he would want to be remembered. No one among you can understand why he thus made the selection so few in number and so unexpected in choice unless you see the very passion of the man's life, the one controlling item, and that is liberty. The biggest word in the vocabulary of the great Democrat was "Liberty." He was the author of the Declaration of Independence—political liberty; he was the author of the Statute of Religious Liberty of Virginia—religious liberty, and in it is another clause that does not appear in the title to the law, namely, the repeal of the law of primogeniture and entail—personal and pecuniary liberty; and lastly, founder of the University of Virginia—educational liberty. There upon his tomb may be read his own estimate of his life, and it comprehends the gamut of liberty, his watchword in his political career.

He said nothing at all about his achievement in the purchase of Louisiana, which in my judgment was the greatest act of his life. He paid no attention to that, because it was fundamental to him that the greatest good that can come to an individual is unrestricted opportunity in the struggle of life to make the most of one's self without restriction from government. [Applause.] That is fundamental in the Jeffersonian theory of politics.

Washington understood this and fully appreciated its importance. He called Jefferson into his cabinet.

Hamilton, totally different, was sharply differentiated in his political theory and schemes of government. He was not rural, not of the country, as Jefferson, but of the city, in the heart of industry—Hamilton was brought up in an entirely different school from Jefferson. Jefferson was in France in the revolution, submerged in the atmosphere that later produced the French revolution of 1789–1792, and we are wondering just what effect the residence in France had upon his theories.

But it was not so with Hamilton. Where at that time was Hamilton? At Valley Forge, following the lead of the great Washington, as we could see by tracking through the snow by the blood trail of the shoeless feet of the soldiers, unsheltered and unclothed; and he would read to Gen. Washington the letters that Hamilton himself had indited, calling upon the States to supply food, to supply shelter, to supply clothing; and the answer, in the language of State sovereignty was, "We will do it when we are ready." And that meant delay. To see men without clothes to cover their nakedness, without blankets upon which to lie, and often without provisions, marching through the snow, and at Christmas time, to take up their quarters within a day's march of the enemy, without a house or hut to shelter them, were some of the lessons taught Hamilton by actual experience at Valley Forge. This was but a comment upon excess of State rights and lack of central authority. Hamilton had seen and suffered all this. Hamilton saw, mark you, a straggling group of soldiers, 80 in number, marching from Lancaster, Pa., to Philadelphia and attacking the Federal Government in the Capital, which was compelled to take shelter under the guns of Trenton—the Government a fugitive from 80 straggling, mutinous soldiers who had not been paid. Hamilton saw the Shay rebellion, and heard the State of Massachusetts call upon the Federal Government to suppress it when the State was told that the Government had no power, and it had to refer it back to the State. Hamilton, reading the treaty of peace with Great Britain, saw pledges to the British Government our Government had bound itself to secure, in the face of which he saw the States violate every one with impunity, and no ability in the Federal Government to prevent it. Hamilton knew that John Adams, in 1784, had gone to Holland to borrow on the credit of the United States $300,000 to save the honor and credit of the United States; and Hamilton knew that John Adams was refused the loan to the Government unless John Adams, the Government's representative, went the Government's personal security to make good the $300,000.

Fellow Members, it is not many days ago that you and I voted, in an urgent deficiency appropriation which carried more than $1,000,000,000, an amount of money that could not have been foreseen when we passed our last bill. Yet a little over 100 years ago our young Republic was refused a loan from Holland of the miserable, miserly sum of $300,000 unless John Adams went the Nation's security. If national impotence ever could reach a lower ebb than that, I am unable to conceive it. What was the matter? The matter was too little power, probably too much liberty. The loose confederation during the most critical era of American history supplies the answer, and what we lacked specifically was power. Washington presided over the convention that followed all this, called for the specific purpose of remedying this organic defection, and he well knew the principles that were proposed and were written in the organic law, and when it came to inaugurating these principles into actual, practical government he displayed a new quality of rare leadership in his determination to utilize the country's greatest talent, divergent though it be in party policy. He chose on the one hand Thomas Jefferson, the representative of the liberty of the citizen, the rights of the States, and the principle of local self-government, all of which are absolutely essential; this in spite of some lack of sympathy for the radicalism of the great Democrat. It was ability he demanded, not docility to any preconceived opinion of his own.

By his side for the purpose of organization of the important Treasury Department he chose his former military secretary, the most constructive mind, according to Mr. Oliver, the English critic, the latest authority on Hamilton, that North America has yet seen. He chose him because he was the greatest representative of power, the veritable antonym of liberty. The words in the vocabulary of Hamilton are power, authority, order, energy, strength, vigor, administration. He looked upon the French Revolution as the most awful calamity or fatality that could overtake and overcome any country; while, on the other hand, Jefferson feared whenever the Government became so centralized that the individual would not have the right to resent what was going on. Jefferson once declared it dangerous if there were not a rebellion at least every 20 years. Now fellow Members, there is no one on either side of this House from the standpoint of a student of political science who has greater admiration than I have for Thomas Jefferson, for what he stood, namely, liberty in the individual under government and the rights of local government in the States; and there is no one on the Republican side of the House or the Democratic who has a greater admiration for Alexander Hamilton, because of the fundamental principles for which he stood, namely, the right to maintain order, the power necessary to say what must be done in the interest of order and government.

The fundamental principles of government as expressed by Hamilton were:

1. A healthful support of government.
2. The recognition of the need of government.
3. Ever-present sense of obligation to government.
4. Reliance upon force to compel obedience.
5. The influence which goes with position.

No one ever expressed in better form the purposes of government than did Hamilton in his first report as Secretary of the Treasury: "To justify and preserve the confidence of the most enlightened friends of good government; to promote the increasing respectability of the American name; to answer the calls of justice; to restore landed property to its true value; to furnish new sources both to agriculture and commerce; to cement more closely the Union of the States; to add to their security against foreign attack; and to establish public order upon the basis of an upright and liberal policy."

As Jefferson was the greatest exponent of liberty in government, so Hamilton was the greatest exponent of power in government. His brief life is but a comment upon this fact. His was a remarkable career. At the early age of 17 he was ripe in constitutional history. At 19 he signalized himself as captain of artillery. At 20 he was made chief aid to Washington, when was begun that singular attachment which induced the great Father of his Country to lean more heavily upon Hamilton for counsel than upon any other American. At 25 he entered Congress; at 29 he became a member of the New York Legislature. At 30 he was a member of the Federal Convention, and by all but universal consent was conceded to be the most original mind in it. At 31 he wrote the Federalist, the strongest presentation of the principles of constructive government extant, and performed the inimitable feat of breaking down a great majority against the Constitution in the New York convention, which did not adjourn until it had ratified the instrument against which the majority was committed. At 32 he was called to the head of the Treasury Department, where his crowning work was accomplished. At the age of 41, on the demand of Washington, he reorganized the armies of the Government, and the next year, upon the death of Washington, he was made first in command. At the age of 47 he fell at the hand of the duelist.

While the fullness of manhood was reached before the age of his majority, the brilliancy of his career was eclipsed by a premature death. The span of his public career would measure 30 years—from 1774 to 1804. Twenty-one of these years were spent in the actual service of the Government at the time when the work of both destroying the old and building the new was done. Hamilton was stronger in building than in destroying. To him more than to any other American is due the title of master builder. But to Washington is due the honor of so directing that the Nation became the beneficiary of both Jefferson and Hamilton without adopting either extreme. And here is the peculiar attitude that is difficult for me to understand. Men accept Jefferson without hesitancy as their guide in all matters governmental but indict Hamilton. Other men accept Hamilton as a safe political prophet but instinctively indict Jefferson. It seems as if we had failed to realize that Jefferson's liberty would be anarchy if not restrained by government, and Hamilton's power and authority would have been monarchy if not restrained by the demands of liberty. [Applause.] Either one of them unrestrained would have gone too far. Why, think of the recommendation of Hamilton in the convention:

> Let the people elect Congress, Congress elect the President, and the President appoint the governors of the various States.

That is certainly centralization. It is order, and without the restraining influence of the school of Jefferson, Hamilton with all his power would have gone too far. Let me say, with all the fervor that I can command, there is no liberty without government, and there is no government without liberty. [Applause.] Liberty must not be confused with license—that is, anarchy—and power must not be confused with monarchy; that would be despotism. Translated in contemporaneous events liberty unrestrained is the Bolsheviki movement in Russia. Power unrestrained is the Hohenzollern autocracy overrunning Europe.

The thought that I wanted to put to the Members here is that in our appreciation of Jefferson in history and our appreciation of Hamilton in history we must not forget that the leading figure that held the two was Washington, and that without the power to amalgamate the two, liberty and power, we never could have had our present American Government. [Applause.] This is the one query: How can we secure strong central government in the interest of order and still maintain local self-government in the interest of liberty? The first is Hamiltonian, the second Jeffersonian. The two combined is Washingtonian. The one thing I want to leave with you is that Washington recognized the extremes and extracted the good from both without incorporating the dangerous. Hamilton was more powerful than was Washington; Jefferson was also more powerful than was Washington when measured intellectually, but not morally. Wide apart as the poles, he took them into his councils and held them together, because he knew they represented fundamentals, and he worked out our present system. This at the very moment when political differences ripened into personal hatreds. Still they were held; one till 1794, the other till 1795. Lincoln did the same. He chose men of the greatest ability and the widest differences politically, because war and its dangers dare not risk mediocrity; and when he put into his Cabinet four old-line Democrats and only three old-line Whigs, Seward warned him and said, "Mr. President, you are unbalancing this Cabinet." Lincoln said, "How?" "Why, you have got four Democrats and only three Whigs." Lincoln smiled and said to Seward, "Well, I am a Whig, and I am going to count one." That was the attitude of Lincoln in the Nation's second crisis. It was much like the country's first President. I want now to make one observation as the lesson of the hour. We have introduced in the House this great railroad bill, which is very important and which the Congress will pass without delay. It has one or two items in it that must be thoroughly discussed, because it involves great possibilities. Here may be the introduction of governmental policies of widest reach, which must be carefully considered, because it is not the length but the direction of the step that is ominous. Another important bill is the financial corporation bill. That must be thoroughly discussed. There may be involved in that bill a fiat danger which must, if possible, be avoided. It must not be lightly looked upon. Another great bill is for the extension of the executive function, a tendency so apparent here in the Capital that one can scarcely avoid strong language in reference to it. That must be thoroughly discussed, and I appeal to the party in power in the light of the example set by the great Washington and followed by the great Lincoln. It does not lie within the mouth of any Member on either side of the aisle, if Members insist upon a thorough discussion and even an attack on some phases of these bills, to say that they are any less patriotic than were the men back in the time of Washington and Lincoln when they were discussing those great questions. There is no danger in open debate. The danger is always when you do not have it. [Applause.]

I feel sure of my ground when I assert that this Congress will pass without any unnecessary delay every measure necessary to speedily end the war. I speak for the Republican side when I say this. But the party in power must concede the right to an opinion, and it would do well if it would observe the conduct of Washington and Lincoln and realize that divided views, the result of ability, are not in themselves a danger. The great leader is the man who can use men who do not always agree with him.

Mr. Speaker, we who are charged with the responsibility of efficiently defending our national honor and safety against the world's greatest example of armed brutality should take daily council of the wisdom of such men as Washington and Lincoln, and, if possible, not only mobilize all our physical power, but especially utilize to the fullest extent the highest type of mental ability, without regard to any party bias. This is the lesson of the hour.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, in President Washington's Farewell Address, just read, he refers to a short proclamation——

The SPEAKER. I know, but the gentleman can not make a speech, because he has no time.

Mr. MASON. I ask unanimous consent to have the Clerk read the proclamation of April, 1793, referred to by President Washington in his Farewell Address.

The SPEAKER. How long is it?

Mr. MASON. About three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas it appears that a state of war exists between Austria, Prussia, Sardinia, Great Britain, and the United Netherlands of the one part and France on the other, and the duty and interest of the United States require that they should with sincerity and good faith adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial toward the belligerent powers:

I have therefore thought fit by these presents to declare the disposition of the United States to observe the conduct aforesaid against those powers, respectively, and to exhort and warn the citizens of the United States carefully to avoid all acts and proceedings whatsoever which may in any manner tend to contravene such disposition.

And I do hereby also make known that whosoever of the citizens of the United States shall render himself liable to punishment or forfeiture under the law of nations by committing, aiding, or abetting hostilities against any of the said powers, or by carrying to any of them those articles which are deemed contraband by the modern usage of nations will not receive the protection of the United States against such punishment or forfeiture; and further, that I have given instructions to those officers to whom it belongs to cause prosecutions to be instituted against all persons who shall, within the cognizance of the courts of the United States, violate the law of nations with respect to the powers at war, or any of them.

In witness whereof I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents and signed the same with my hand.

Done at the city of Philadelphia the 22d day of April, 1793, and of the Independence of the United States of America the seventeenth.

[SEAL.] GO. WASHINGTON.

By the President:

TH: JEFFERSON.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GREGG (at the request of Mr. SLAYDEN) was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FESS, by unanimous consent, was given leave to revise and extend his remarks.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9685) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW].

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we have had the great pleasure of listening to Dr. FESS make a very eloquent address on George Washington and kindred subjects. We have heard him state with great positiveness that the country will never be injured by too much intelligent debate in Congress, but is likely to be by too little. I agree with him on that general proposition. Legislation which we pass is too frequently marked by too little concern, too little straightforward discussion, perhaps by too much of what we call "bunk," and on the whole we do not confine ourselves perhaps as carefully as we might to the merits of bills before us.

The committee which reported this bill into the House was in session for about a month with very full attendance. Great interest was taken by Members, discussion was abundant, good fellowship prevailed, differences of opinion existed, and finally conclusions were reached. At no time was any witness limited in his presentation of testimony, and at no time was any Member deprived of a full opportunity to ask questions. The result of it is the bill which is now before you.

The President of the United States by proclamation took control of the railroads. This bill became necessary. It came before the committee as an administration bill pure and simple. Nobody has denied it. The Secretary of the Treasury was named Director General of Railroads. Those who presented the bill stated frankly that they appeared in behalf of the Director General and through him the President of the United States. So it is fair for everybody to assume, I think, that the bill as it was initiated and as it was developed, discussed, and finally passed was the proposition of the administration.

When the bill was first brought up it differed in many respects from what it now appears to be, but as we went on the representatives of the administration and the members of the committee began to realize that there were shortcomings, and every effort was made to get together.

There are four leading subjects in the bill which have been and probably will continue to be matters of central interest. I shall speak of them as they occur to me in what seems to my mind to be the logical order. There was quite considerable concern as to whether or not the employees of the railroad companies were to continue to be employees of the companies or to be considered hereafter as employees of the Government. The bill was finally framed so as to leave them employees of the railroads, and the general interpretation of the bill was that the Federal Government merely took control of the railroad properties as it found them, that it was to direct the operations, but that it was not to employ or direct the men or otherwise come in close contact with the employees or the general business transactions of the railroad companies. I think it perhaps would not be worth while to take any time now to discuss the wisdom of so framing this bill as to leave the employees within the control of the companies. That subject quite likely will be brought up under five-minute debate, and it may be that we shall want to take a hand in discussing that question if it comes up.

The amount of return was a very important question, which was considered, and finally that which is set forth in the bill was agreed upon. So far as I know, from listening to the debate here and reading the speeches that have been made on the subject, there is likely to be some difference of opinion and perhaps some variation of interpretation as to what is really the right thing to do in remunerating the roads which may be taken over. Yesterday one of the Members on this floor raised the point that some of the railroads were appearing to receive an excessive rate of interest, a too large return. That question could be elaborated, but I shall try to sum up my judgment in a few words. It is quite true that on the face of it some railroads would appear to be getting an excessive return, but that is not really the whole story. Some railroads have been skinning along, robbing their treasuries for the purpose of dividends, neglecting to put back money which they should into their own properties, and the result has been that of late years, as with any other commercial concern, they have gone downward, and they have duly had difficulty in making great earnings or in paying any kind of dividends. On the other hand, there are roads which have been well managed, which have fostered their resources, which have put in large sums of money annually for the upkeep of their property until they have brought their companies into good order, the properties in fine shape; and, as with any other commercial undertaking, when they have become established in good condition they have paid proper dividends on the value of their stock. Nobody here has seemed to raise the point as to how many years, for instance, a now prosperous railroad may have paid no dividends. The question seems to have been entirely as to what they have paid in the last three years. That is not the fair way to look at it, and the committee, I think, gave heed to the consideration that if a road by virtue of being profitable as a result of keeping up its property and, generally speaking, as a result of good, clever, and scientific management found itself during the past three years, when business has averaged fair, so that it could pay a large dividend, the owners of the stock were entitled to fair or even generous remuneration.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes, indeed.

Mr. GORDON. How does the gentleman come to determine that the stock was worth the amount for which these roads were capitalized?

Mr. WINSLOW. Capitalization is not the question. That is a misnomer which a great many people who are not thorough fall into.

Mr. GORDON. Yes; I know.

Mr. WINSLOW. I am not making a personal application.

Mr. GORDON. How did the gentleman determine it?

Mr. WINSLOW. I will tell the gentleman how I determined it. The value of a security ought to depend on two elements—first, on the property back of it, and then on the earning capacity. I would not accept the one or the other as being final.

Mr. GORDON. How did you determine the property back of it?

Mr. WINSLOW. On the valuations as they appear and are reported in various reports, and finally on the facts.

Mr. GORDON. We have spent $11,000,000 undertaking to value these railroads for the purpose of finding out what property they had.

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Did the gentleman give any consideration to that?

Mr. WINSLOW. Just what does the question mean—when it is finished? Does the gentleman mean with respect of the $11,000,000?

Mr. GORDON. No. I say we have spent $11,000,000 in the process of valuing these properties for the purpose of finding out what they are worth. What I want to know is how the committee found out so quickly a thing that we have spent these $11,000,000 for and have not yet had any report upon.

Mr. WINSLOW. I appreciate the humor of the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. GORDON. There is no humor about it. [Laughter.] It is a question for information that I am asking. The gentleman is a member of the committee, is he not?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes

Mr. GORDON. I would like to have the gentleman answer.

Mr. WINSLOW. I can answer the part of the gentleman's question which would seem to me to indicate a serious inquiry. We have only had those facts which are of record and we have not attempted to be mind readers and forestall the report of the inquiring board. We have taken only those returns which are of record and have accepted them at their face value.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman means the records of the railroads?

Mr. WINSLOW. As reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission and as submitted by the various people who have given testimony.

Mr. GORDON. Did the gentleman give any consideration to the question of this information that has been collected by the expenditure of this $11,000,000?

Mr. WINSLOW. Only to realize they had not any report to turn in. I think in one or two cases Judge Prouty, if I am not mistaken, gave a fragmentary report as to the results of the findings wherever they had approached completion.

Mr. GORDON. Well, now, did the committee consider this? In the appropriation of all other private property since this war started in very many instances they were unable to determine the value of the property taken—in this case you determine the use of the property only, and in the other cases they were appropriating only part of the compensation—did the committee give any consideration to the suggestion that they should appropriate only sufficient of what the dividends actually paid in the last three years were and leave the final determination to await the finish of this appraisal by the Interstate Commerce Commission? Did the committee give that any consideration?

Mr. WINSLOW. Let us get together on this. I do not want to be answering one question when the gentleman is making a different inquiry. The gentleman is referring to the amount of dividend returns?

Mr. CORDON. Yes; the amount of dividends that should be paid. The gentleman determines that by taking the total earnings of the road for the past three years, as I understand it.

Mr. WINSLOW. No.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman does not?

Mr. WINSLOW. No.

Mr. GORDON. Well, that is my understanding.

Mr. WINSLOW. That is only part of the question. I was fearful the gentleman was not comprehending the whole situation. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. I understand it all right. If I have not made myself clear——

Mr. WINSLOW. Let me continue—the old clock is moving around. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. If I can have time I would like to discuss this economic proposition with my friend, but I am afraid——

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I suppose the gentleman from Wisconsin might possibly yield the gentleman some time, if I can have his attention.

Mr. GORDON. If I have not made my question clear already I can in a very few words, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. ESCH. The time required on this side is so largely taken that I can not make many extensions, but it may be possible to yield a few additional minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. WINSLOW. It is not my request, but yet I desire to tell anything I know that is proper.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to know how the gentleman gets at this figure.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. I think for the purpose, Mr. Chairman, of his inquiry, I can not yield, because it will take, I am well aware, more time to answer his question the way he has put it than the time I have at my disposal.

Mr. GORDON. I think the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. WINSLOW. The question is a difficult one, and I want to answer, in a measure but in a limited way, the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio. There are hundreds of railroads in this country, very few of them known, apparently, to any considerable number of people. They know the great trunk lines, but they do not know the great multitude of short lines in different parts of the country which come in under the scope of this bill. We found out on the second day, if I mistake not, of the hearings that there were hundreds of roads around through the United States which would probably not mean anything to the Government for war purposes, and the truth came out that the purpose of the Director General, when he got ready—although he had taken every one over by separate order, although he had issued general orders to all of them—he proposed to drop a lot one of these days, when he got ready. No railroad president was in the hearing who could find out when his turn was going to come. He did not know anything about it. The Director General would not tell him anything about it. Now, those roads represented all conditions of prosperity, and many of them conditions of no prosperity whatever. That feature must be considered. This bill is drawn in such a way that by an elastic provision it allows the President to treat with each road that he wants to consider or otherwise, and in that way those unhappy little roads may get out from under. It was beyond all human possibility for any committee in the time allotted, if ever, to draw a bill which would measure out accurately to each railroad exactly what was fair to it, so they have had to blanket those; and the bill, naturally, has been drawn to meet war conditions, to meet an exigency, so that when we begin to operate under this legislation, if it is passed, we will begin to get to business on the railroads immediately and allow the less consequential considerations to come up and be taken care of in due time. But some of the committee—and I believe for my own part a good many of the committee—agreed that the basis of remuneration set forth in the bill is as fair and equitable a basis as can be figured out in the short time allotted, when one considers the great interests involved and the varying conditions throughout the different roads as well as the necessity of as prompt legislation as is reasonably possible.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. WINSLOW. Gladly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is presumed there will be a considerable number of roads that will not be taken over?

Mr. WINSLOW. I think it can be fairly presumed on the statements of the gentlemen representing railroads through the hearings and from the testimony of the Director General that the number of such roads would run into the hundreds.

The next point of real interest which will have to be considered is the power of establishing the rates by the President of the United States. Herein the view of the committee members differed. The majority favored the bill as printed; a minority was in favor of putting the power to establish rates in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I represent in thought and in action the minority views in respect of this matter and I wish to give my own opinion. The Interstate Commerce Commission, I believe, represents pretty generally in this undertaking the interests of the great public of this country.

It has been a much-discussed body. It has stirred up the animosity of first one element of the community and then another. Take it far and wide, it has been exasperatingly slow at times. It has not been able always to render decisions quickly enough to suit everybody, but perhaps that has been the natural result of the condition in which it found itself. The problem is an enormous one—far beyond the comprehension of people who have not gone into it carefully. The opportunities for action on the part of the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission have been many and varied, and have constantly increased. Their ramifications have multiplied, and it has not been strange that a commission, if starting off with a little handful of employees and now having grown into a commission of thousands, they should have found the attending duties engrossing, perplexing, and frequently beyond their power for quick action.

However that may be, they have collected invaluable data, they have learned the "wiles" of the game, they know the "ins" and "outs" of the railroad problems, they have become expert as to how to get at and analyze railroad figures and statistics, and how to get information, and when and where such is to be obtained, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. WINSLOW. To sum up the reason for standing by the commission rather than to accept the provisions of the bill. I represent my own views, gentlemen, and possibly those of others. I hope so. There are two reasons in my mind why we should not let the President make the rates under the arrangements set forth in the bill. In the first place, we have a commission which has been set up by Congress to do this work.

They have been indorsed by Congress and by the people all this time; otherwise they would have long since been wiped out. They would not have grown from three or four men to several thousand men if there had not been a good excuse for their existence. They have been kept on and ought to know their business, and, so far as I have been able to learn, they do. That is one reason for keeping them there. They are a public institution, as much a part of the Government of this country, as things are going now, as the Congress of the United States or the President himself. I am willing to trust the commission under war exigencies to discriminate wisely and to act as promptly as good judgment and the well-being of our people demand.

Mr. COADY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. It would be a pleasure to yield, but I can not do it now.

In the second place, I think we are going too far in the direction of throwing all the fiscal arrangements of the United States under the head of one or two men. [Applause.] They can neither conceive nor cover them. No man has ever been known in this world, I believe, or ever will be, of sufficient capacity to take over or act wisely as an advisor of all the growing elaboration and direction of the new departments as we are setting them up, to say nothing of the three or four or five or more which are already on the board and about to be skidded into us for legislative consideration and establishment. I do not believe that the President—and I will give him all the respect that he deserves—or the Secretary of the Treasury can go on indefinitely taking jobs, each one of them big enough for the biggest man that ever lived, and carry them out successfully. For such reasons I think we are better off to have this matter of legislation in reference to rates in the hands of men who have had some training in such matters, who have nothing but railroad matters to think about, than to leave them in the hands of somebody or anybody who can be no more than a figurehead in the operation, and who himself must appeal to somebody else, and then have that consideration only one of a multitude of cares which are pressing down on his brow with constantly increasing pressure every minute of the day and night. [Applause.]

The question of time of return of the railroads taken over to their owners is another point of this bill which interests everybody. The proposition is, Shall there be a time set for the return of these roads by the Government, or shall there be no time set? This question was marked and debated clearly and fairly. The committee took it up, and they voted to set a time limit. They agreed on a time to terminate two years after the signing of peace ratifications. A minority thought that two years was too long. In the testimony before the committee, if you will read it you will find that the time mentioned by witnesses to be allowed for giving back the roads varied from one day to three years.

The testimony, as it appeared to me, was given by those whose opinion I most respected, indicated six months to a year. In order to be on the safe side, a year was the time indicated by those who filed minority views. I do not feel sure that a year will be long enough; but at all events a year will be long enough to determine whether or not a further period is needed. The question can be better decided under conditions prevailing then rather than be dealt with now, say, three or four or more years ahead. If not more than a year is necessary, the roads will be automatically turned over to the owners, and this war emergency railroad legislation will be forthwith terminated. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I hope to have a little time under the five-minute rule in which to address the committee. I use this minute to say that I listened to the reading of the proclamation of George Washington at the request of my colleague [Mr. MASON] a short time ago. I indorse George Washington now, and if I had been living I would have indorsed him then, and what he did. I indorse that proclamation. We were neutral when the nations were at war in Europe, and in that proclamation was noted that whoever violated neutrality would be punished. I believe if either one of those nations had given notice to us and to all the world that when our ships were on the world's highway they would be blown up without notice and then proceeded to blow them up, George would have said we ought to have war and have asked Congress to declare war against the nation so acting. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER], a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for one hour.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I hardly think that I shall take a full hour in talking, but I do want to take a little of your time with the hope that I may be of some help in reaching a correct solution of this important problem.

I need not remind this body of the importance of this problem. As has been said, it affects the property rights of this country to an extent estimated at from eighteen to twenty billion dollars. It affects an industry which employs 1,700,000 men, constituting some of the most skillful and most patriotic and most efficient men of this country. But the amount of money invested in this industry, the property rights involved, yea, even the large number of men employed in the industry, does not constitute the greatest element of importance in this question. Transportation is the very breath of our national prosperity and even existence. The wheat must be hauled to the market and to the mill; the cattle must be slaughtered and shipped to the consumers of this country; the cotton from the Southland must be carried to the mills and made into cloth. The question of the money invested is important. The question of the men employed is important. But let us not at the outset lose sight of the fact that the very existence of this country, in time of peace as well as in time of war, depends upon transportation, and efficient transportation. Its importance in time of war is even greater than in time of peace. Our soldiers must be clothed, they must be fed, and under our complex system of national life, with our broad expanse of territory, the products of California and the products of the South and the products of the North must be gathered together through the centers, and upon the railroads of this country they must be carried to do the people any good, and especially the soldiers that are fighting this war.

Whatever property rights may be involved, whatever employees may be affected, let us not lose sight of the fundamental fact in this struggle, as expressed by the Fuel Commissioner, Mr. Garfield; let us never lose sight of the fact that always and ever while this war is on "the ships must sail," and the ships can not sail without coal, and the ships must not sail empty of food.

The great object, then, that led to the taking over of the railroads was efficient transportation. The railroad transportation of the country had broken down. There is no use in denying it. There is no use in spending time here in going into all the reasons for it. But it became necessary in order to carry on this war to unify, to coordinate the transportation facilities of this country. Under an act of Congress passed in 1916 the President was given authority to take over the railroads. He took them over; he took them over for the purpose of perfecting the system and creating greater efficiency. Congress had the right to give him that authority. Then there was left to us an important question—the question of compensation. That was a question, I say, that was left to us. I do not mean that we have a right to fix the compensation. The fixing of compensation for the railroads or any other property that is taken by the Government for public use can not be done by Congress or any other legislative body. That is a judicial question. This is not the land of the Bolsheviki. This is the land of liberty; but it is also a land of law, a land of order, and a land where property rights are still sacred, whether it be the property rights of the humblest man following the plow or the property rights of the man who owns the bank or the railroad.

It will not do any good to say, "We will take these railroads; these men have more money than they need." The same right that protects your hearthstone and mine and the hearthstone of the humblest follower of the plow protects also the hearthstones of the men who own these railroads, and prevents the taking of their property without adequate compensation or due process of law.

We have a right to take over the railroads, but no man in this House has the right to say how much they shall be paid. Do not let us lose sight of that fact. The owners of the roads can not prevent us from taking their property for public use, neither can the public prevent them from exercising their right of going into court and demanding just compensation.

And that brings me to another question: The prime question, the impelling motive for taking over the roads, was to better the transportation facilities of the country. But along with that taking over was something almost as important as transportation efficiency itself, and that was the financial stability of this country in this awful struggle. From 18 to 20 billions of property in this country is invested in railroads, differently estimated by different people as to the amount. Do I need to remind any man in this House that that vast amount of property value forms at least an important stone in the foundation of our financial structure? Some have estimated it to be one-seventh of all the property in the United States. You and I can not trace the varying places where these securities and these stocks and bonds may be found.

It is true a few men own a large per cent of them, but it is also true that they are found in the humblest homes of widows and orphans, in insurance companies, and in the trust funds; and if justice were not done to these security rights and these property rights, do I need to remind intelligent men that it would be a blow not only to this one stone in the structure but that it might cause all of it to tumble to the ground? So in taking over these roads it is important not to shake the financial structure.

Now, how can that be done? It is easy for us to say, "We have taken your railroads." It is easy to reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON]. I wish he were here. It would be easy to say in reply to his question, "How much are they worth?" "I do not know." You do not know; President Wilson does not know; Secretary McAdoo does not know. How can you know? We have spent already $11,000,000 to try to estimate the physical value of the railroads, and I think they tell us that physical valuation will be finished in 1921. That is just the physical value. That does not mean that then you have got a complete basis on which to estimate what is a reasonable compensation for the use. I might have a railroad between here and Baltimore with 10,000 bridges on it. It would cost an immense sum of money, but it would not be worth a cent more than one that did not have a single bridge. You can not fix the rate on just what the property costs. There are many and varied questions that enter into this. Now, what shall we do? Shall we say to them, "Go into court," which they have a right to do? No power in the United States, as long as that Constitution, of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] spoke is in existence, can keep them from going into court.

Shall we tell them to go into court and take the valuation of their railroads and bring in all the elements that go into the making up of the value of the use of them, spend six months on the trial of each single, solitary case before the court? Then there would be the right of appeal, due process of law. How long would it take? What would be the result if we told them to go into court and settle their rights there? Any man who wanted to break down this war could do it by putting the railroads of this country into litigation—a large percentage of them. So what did Congress have the right to do? We could not say, "Stay out of court." We could simply say this, "Now, you owners of the railroads, we can not tell you what you have got to take. We have a right, however, as legislators to make you an offer," and that is what we have tried to do in the bill. We have tried to make them an offer, to lay down a basis of authority for the President to make a trade with the railroads for their use during Federal control. That is all there is in the bill. Do not rail at this committee and say, "How quickly did you decide on the value?" We did not decide. We could not decide. You could not decide. It would take you and me and probably many of us here many years to understand the intricacies of the details of the railroad question; but the general principles one man can understand about as well as another. And one of those fundamental principles is this, that if we take over private property for public use we must pay reasonable compensation for that use; and in estimating the value of that use we can consider the demonstrated value of the use for a reasonable time before the taking. So we took a period of three years before our entrance into the war and divided the annual operating income of those three years by three and called that the standard return. Some would say take four years, take five, some ten. I can not go into all the reasons why, if you go back too far, it would not be just, because every year that the railroads continue in existence the money put into their property increases. So the further away you get from the time of taking the more danger there is of doing injustice to all concerned.

So we thought, and to be frank with you, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] said, the men who wrote the bill, Mr. Anderson, of the Interstate Commerce Commission; Secretary McAdoo, and even the President himself in consultation no doubt—in fact, his proclamation spoke of that—took this as a fair basis of compensation during the period of Federal control.

Now, when you go back home and they say to you, "You paid the railroads too much," what are you going to say? Some fellow will say to you, "Why, what did you give the railroads that amount of money for? Why didn't you take their property the same as you took the other property of the country?" I even heard a speech in another body in this great Capitol, in which it was said, "They say if we can draft the boys of the country, why not draft the property of the railroad companies?"

We will draft the property of the railroad companies, we will draft your property and mine, and the property of the farmer, but we will do it according to law by means of taxation, and not by confiscation and the violation of the Constitution. When you get back home, what are you going to say about the way this was fixed? I will tell you what I am going to say. I am going to say that for 30 years there has been in this country, growing up and increasing in efficiency and power and intelligence, a great body called the Interstate Commerce Commission, whose duty it has been, so far as possible, to determine what is fair compensation for the railroads. That body has the confidence and respect of the people of the United States. In some places there is more confidence in it than in others, but it is the only body we have. We simply took what they had allowed these roads to receive during the last three years, and divided it by three, and said to the railroads, "We will give you that same amount during the continuance of Federal control." Can you beat that system?

Our much-esteemed colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] did not say that this amount was too large, as I understood him, but he did say that he recommended paying them a certain per cent on their stock and on their bonds, and then dividing the surplus between them and the Government. He gave as his reason for doing this that under the system which we have adopted there is no incentive for the railroad officials, like the presidents and superintendents, to put forth their best energies to make the railroad management a success during Federal control. In other words, briefly stated, he says if we guarantee a definite sum to the owners of the railroads and the men who run them during Federal control, what incentive is there to make the railroad officials put forth their best energies and to see that the industry is a success? Well, that is a fair question. It is one that appeals to anybody. But my answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin is this: His proposition is fundamentally unworkable for the purposes for which we took over the railroads at this time. We took over the railroads at this time so that we could, if necessary, say to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, "Clear the tracks! Get your passenger trains off of there. We are going to ship coal over your road." But they say, "There is no money in coal. We want to ship iron or steel or passengers." "Clear the track, Baltimore & Ohio! We are going to ship coal over your road and nothing else. It is for the good of the country." We can say to the Pennsylvania, "You have been making more money than anybody else in the country. You have got the best railroad, but we want to use it for a certain business that is not as profitable as the other kinds of business in this country." We will divert the business from one railroad to another railroad if necessary in order to have efficient transportation and in order that "the ships may sail." That is the test in this war. Now, how are you going to do that?

If the plan of the gentleman from Wisconsin was put into force and the surplus divided between the Government and the railroad company, would the Pennsylvania Railroad be anxious for ships to sail, or would it want to get the business? Would the Baltimore & Ohio have the incentive to make the loaded ships sail, or would they want to make money for their company? That is the reason we could not adopt his system. That is the reason the director of the railroads and Mr. Anderson, who wrote the bill, decided that it was unworkable and that the present system was the only way to do it.

Now, I admit, gentlemen, that there will be some slackers among railroad presidents and railroad companies. I expect that there will be slackers among them, as in all other classes, but I believe most of them are patriotic enough in this hour of need to do their duty. Some men have spoken in favor of these gentlemen, and I indorse a good deal that has been said about their patriotism and their ability. But let me tell you something. The men who are presidents of the railroads, put there by the financiers and bankers of the country, do not always run the trains. You have never seen any on the engines, you have never seen any on the locomotives, you have never seen them turn a switch, you have never seen them at the ticket window. If any president of a railroad shirks, the Director General can fill his place, and the patriotic railroad men of this country will come to the rescue of our transportation system and "the ships will sail." [Applause.]

Now, I want to say a few words about the question of rates. I want to call your attention to one inconsistency in some of the men who are so eulogistic of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Some men on our committee and some who appeared before our committee claimed that this compensation, which is according to what the Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed for the last three years, was too high. Yet these same men are insisting that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall not by any circumstance be interfered with by the President of the United States. Well, they can not blow both hot and cold. If this same Interstate Commerce Commission is so vital to the welfare of transportation that you can not let the President of the United States interfere with its authority, why are you blaming us for following their findings in fixing the compensation for railroads during the time of Federal control?

But that is not what I started out to say. I want to be fair about this question of rates. The members of the committee differed, and the point of difference, I think, is this: I think we all agree that the President has got to initiate the rates if these are ever changed, unless we change the law as it is now. The President, who takes the place of the owners of the road, must initiate the rates if they are to be changed. Now, under the bill as we have it, anybody who is dissatisfied with the rate which is initiated may have the matter referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission is instructed by this bill to make an investigation thoroughly and carefully. Now we come to the point of diversion. Some say that their recommendations should be final and conclusive. Those of us in the majority of the committee concluded that it was better to have the President's authority final and binding.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. While the President has the power to initiate a rate, does it go into effect until it is reviewed and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission under this bill?

Mr. DECKER. Candor compels me to say that it goes into effect immediately.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. IGOE. The rates fixed by the President are merely for the duration of control by the Government, or do they last until subsequently modified in the old way by action of the railroads and the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman ask me that question when I get to the most important question—the question of turning them back to the railroad companies? Well, I will answer it now: It will take legislation to readjust that, regardless of whether the rates are fixed by the President during the war or by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is one reason I am not for putting a stop watch on the time to turn them back, so that we may have an opportunity to work out the kind of legislation wanted.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman has stated that in the majority bill a rate fixed by the President is final. I ask him, as a lawyer, whether Congress has any power to delegate to the President the power to fix rates finally?

Mr. DECKER. I will answer the gentleman's question by asking him another. Is not the President of the United States a citizen? Is there any reason why we can not delegate the power to him as much as to five or six citizens on the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. LENROOT. The Interstate Commerce Commission acts under the rule laid down, carrying out the law, and we have made their rates final except they go so far as confiscation of property. Under the power delegated to the President in this bill there is no such power conferred.

Mr. DECKER. I do not think that the gentleman has read the bill carefully, because the bill provides that the rates must be just and reasonable. It does not mean that the President can fix any rate, but he is to use reason, justice, and fairness, and avoid all discrimination. I have heard it said here that under this power he can make Chicago a desert. He can make Chicago a desert under this power if he wanted to violate his oath of office, but no intelligent man would use such discrimination against Chicago as to make it a desert without knowing that he was doing something wrong.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would not the Supreme Court have the right to pass upon the reasonable and just rates fixed by the President?

Mr. LENROOT. Would it unless the law lays down some restrictions on the President?

Mr. DECKER. The Supreme Court would, because there is one thing Congress can not do. It can not confiscate a man's property, it can not take anything away from him without due process of law. The rights of the railroads and the shippers can always be determined in court under a claim that they are discriminatory, unjust, and in violation of the law.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman contend that it is due process of law to delegate to the President or anyone else the right to make a rate without a hearing upon the part of the shipper? That is what is done in this bill.

Mr. DECKER. Oh, we do not do that in our bill, begging the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. SIMS. The railroads, before they were turned over, absolutely made their own rates without consulting the shipper.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Any shipper, as the gentleman well knows, had a right to go into court upon any rate prior to the enactment of the Interstate Commerce Commission law.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; but he does not make it.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand; but he had his remedy.

Mr. DECKER. The thing I wanted to say on this subject was this, and I do not want to take up too much of your time: I am opposed to taking away the power of the President to fix the rates in case in his wisdom as a war emergency he thinks he should do it. How is the ordinary business of the country conducted? Does the man who owns the farm and spends the money in the operation of the farm have the right to say what he shall sell his products for, so far as he can get a market? Who fixes the price of the commodity of the manufacturer of this country? In other words, the man who runs the manufactory and spends the money in operation also determines, as far as he is able, the amount of income he gets, does he not? In other words, the successful way to run a business is to let the man who handles the expenses try and fix, if he has wisdom enough, the amount of income that he can get out of the business. You say that can not be done with the railroads, because the railroads are not a private business, but are quasi public, and that while they are private in the sense that private money is being used in their operation, yet that the public has such an interest that it would not be safe to let the men who spend the money on the railroads in building them up, equipping them, and paying the labor say how much income they shall get from them, and so, after many years of experience, we established the Interstate Commerce Commission, the object of which was to stand between the public and the selfishness of the men who owned these railroads. Is not that a fair statement?

And do not you see the minute that the President of the United States steps into the shoes of the railroads the situation is changed? You do not have to protect the people of the country against the President of the United States. He has no selfish interest to serve. Not a dollar goes into his pocket. He has but one ambition, to serve his country and win the esteem and affection of his countrymen. That is the only interest he can have. There is still one danger, and I want to be fair. He may have the best intention, but you say he has not the intelligence. That is, you do not mean by that he lacks the broad mental power and acumen, but that this is such a special business, so intricate and technical, that it is impossible for him to know the details sufficiently to fix the rates. That is the very reason why we provided two things in this bill. We provided in this bill that the President of the United States in running the railroads—and this is in addition to section 11—could at any time avail himself of the services, advice, and cooperation not only of the Interstate Commerce Commission but of any other department of the Government.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman think it would ever have been necessaray to establish the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate rates if these transportation facilities had been owned by the Government originally?

Mr. DECKER. I think not. I think that the only thing that the public had to protect itself against was not the lack of intelligence and knowledge on the part of the owners but the innate human selfishness that is in us all.

Mr. HARDY. In other words, the gentleman thinks the Interstate Commerce Commission was provided to protect the public against the greed of the private owners?

Mr. DECKER. The private owners, who were performing a governmental function, to wit, running the public highways of the country, and it was not safe to turn over to them, unrestricted, the right to set the toll or levy the tax for using the roads.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman stated a few moments ago that the Interstate Commerce Commission now had power to fix the rates, and that that power was placed with them for one reason, to protect the public, and then the gentleman stated that the President had no selfish interest to serve. What I want to know is this: Has the Interstate Commerce Commission any selfish interest to serve, and why could not they take care of the rate making at this just as well as at any other time?

Mr. DECKER. That is a fair question. It is a matter of judgment. I am not going to rail against any man in this House that thinks it should be left with the Interstate Commerce Commission; I am not going to say to him that he does not believe in the patriotism of his President. I believe it should be left to the President, and I was telling the first reason. In other words, the fundamental principle of running every business is to let the man who pays out the money set the price upon the product, and thereby determine the income. Have you not heard criticism on every side that while the railroad officials have to spend the money for higher wages, for more equipment, for rails, ties, rights of way, and terminals, yet when it comes to getting the money to pay for all these things they have to go to somebody else to get it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman seems to think that if this power is vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission and not in the President, it would impeach the President's patriotism or intelligence.

Mr. DECKER. Oh, no; I did not say that. I say I am not accusing anybody of such a thing because he wants the power placed in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The point I want to make is this, that nobody assumes that the President himself would exercise these powers directly. These powers must be exercised through agencies, because it is not possible for the President to do it. The question arises, and I think it is one well worthy of answer, Why not let this power be exercised by a tribunal organized according to law, charged with that duty, and presumably equipped for the duty?

Mr. DECKER. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion, and that is the gist of the question; and I hope I shall not be interrupted until at least I try to answer it.

Mr. MADDEN. Why does not the gentleman answer this question?

Mr. DECKER. It is practically the same, although I think my colleague misunderstood my answer. The reason is this: Either turn over to the Interstate Commerce Commission not only the fixing of rates, but also fixing the rate of wages, the price of steel, the cost of bridges and terminals. In other words, give the body that determines the income the right to say what the outgo will be. That is my contention; that is the business way of doing anything. And then do not you see another reason in this? I have reminded you that the President has no ulterior motive. We have said in this bill that he has the right to avail himself of the services of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and anybody in the United States who feels he is wronged by any rate fixed by the President has the right to have an investigation and then the commission makes a report. So, then, there would be little or no chance for him to make a mistake for lack of information. Many questions come up in an ordinary rate case that is brought before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The owners of the roads come in and explain what improvements they have made, how many bridges they have built, how much the steel has cost that they have put on; the Interstate Commerce Commission goes into every detail of it, and if any of that money has been unwisely or foolishly spent, it is not considered in the fixing of the rate.

Do you want the President of the United States, who has upon his shoulders the Herculean task of bettering the equipment and transportation of the railroads of this country, every time that he wants to build a new bridge or lay some new ties or construct a terminal or do some other extraordinary imperative thing which he thinks is necessary in order "that the ships may sail"—do you want him to have to ask himself the question, Will the Interstate Commerce Commission give me the money to do that work?

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield right there? In connection with the question by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], did not the entire committee agree that it was absolutely necessary that the President should initiate the rates?

Mr. DECKER. Well, I would not say, I do not believe that question was raised in the committee directly.

Mr. HARDY. Was not the difference between you whether or not the Interstate Commerce Commission should have the power to overrule the President?

Mr. DECKER. It was the only question, I think, and if I am not stating it correctly I trust any gentleman of the committee will correct me, and there can be no other question——

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. I will.

Mr. RUSSELL. Is not one of the chief reasons for providing in this bill that the President shall initiate the rates because war is on, that is the reason for taking possession of the roads, and there might be some emergency in which it might be necessary to act very expeditiously, and it was believed by the committee the President could initiate or change a rate more expeditiously than if it were left in a body like the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. DECKER. I am not satisfied to go only that far; there is more involved in it than that. He has not only got the right to initiate the rate, but I want this understood—for it is not my intention to deceive any of my colleagues—he has got the right, even after the Interstate Commerce Commission has made its report and findings, to use his honest judgment and answer to the people of the United States who elected him. In other words, after giving this extraordinary power to the President of the United States I do not want him, if transportation facilities should break down again, or anybody who, as his friend and his advocate should come around and tell me, "Yes; it broke down, but it was because some one else did not do their part; it was because the Interstate Commerce Commission would not let him raise the rates sufficient to make money to run the railroads adequately"—I want to be able, if these transportation facilities break down in this hour of tragedy and need, to point a finger to him and say, "Mr. President, thou art the man."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DECKER. I have just got a moment or so, and I would like to go on——

Mr. STEVENSON. Just to ask this question. The gentleman stated a minute ago he did not want the President to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission to get money if there was a shortage. Is not Congress usually in the habit of giving the President in war time all the money he wants, and he does not need——

Mr. DECKER. That is a pertinent question, and one I started to answer before the gentleman asked me. My time remaining is very short, but I will answer it. Who is the best judge of the exigency of the Treasury of the United States, and how much more strain it will bear before this war is over—who is the best judge, the President of the United States or the Interstate Commerce Commission? I understand the fact that if we reduce the rates during this war the people of the United States, if they wanted to, could vote taxes to make up the deficiency, but the honest opinion of the intelligent business men and thoughtful men of this country, I believe, is that the cost of manufacturing should be borne by manufacturing, that the cost of mining should be borne by mining, and likewise the cost of transportation should be borne by transportation throughout this struggle.

But, gentlemen of the committee, I must hurry on. I come, gentlemen, to what I consider the most important part of the bill.

That is the question as to how long Federal control shall last. And let me say at the outset now, men, this is a question that involves only a few lines in the bill, but it is very important. Do not get it into your heads what they have been telling, that if at the end of two years we are not ready to turn them back all we have to do is to pass a resolution through both Houses. That is told you here with a good deal of force, but it is not true, in my humble opinion, and I will tell you why.

What do we do in this bill? In this bill we just give the President the right to make the contract with the railroads for compensation for a certain time. And after that contract is written and signed by the President, do you think Congress could come in and extend it without the consent of the railroads? It can not be done. We can do at the end of two years just what we are doing now. We can make them an offer, and they can take it or let it alone, as they please. You can not continue this thing without their consent, because it is a solemn contract which you and I authorize the President of the United States to make. So, then, gentlemen, we are up to the proposition of how long this shall last. The majority of our committee believed that there should be a definite, specific limit set. I opposed it in the committee, and I oppose it here now. I want to give my reasons.

No man knows what the situation will be when the war is over. In the first place, how long will the war last? Can any man say? What will be the extent of our exhaustion when the war is over? Can you say? What will be the financial situation in this country when the treaty of peace is finally signed and ratified? Can you say? Can you say whether the railroad owners of this country will have the money to take the railroads back when the war is over? Can you say that they will have the money to supply the equipment and to rehabilitate the railroads so that they will come up to a standard of efficiency in this country that the people of a great Nation deserve and are entitled to? Can you say it? Can you say how much money of the people you will vote during this Federal control and put into the railroads? We put $500,000,000 in this bill. I predict, and I am no prophet, that it will be a billion and a half or two billions before the war is over. There will be money put into the railroads for rolling stock, for new engines, for new bridges, for new terminal facilities, and for new equipment, and it should be put there. It will be well spent. You know that. It will be money spent in this war in order to have victory. Gentlemen lose sight of the fact that no matter how much steel rails may cost at this time, no matter how high labor is for construction, no difference what things cost, the important thing in this struggle is "the ships must sail." Our boys are on the other side; they are in the trenches. Shall we let them go without food and without clothing? No. We will build entire new railroads if it is necessary in order that "the ships may sail." [Applause.]

Ah, my friends, you who vote to turn these back at a certain time, do you know just how much of the people's money you are turning back to the private owners? Will it be a billion or a billion and a half or two billions of dollars? What is going to become of that money? It does not sound as if it were much now, but a day will come when the sons of toil will ask you, "What did you do with that money?" And you have got to answer them in that day. Are you going to turn it back to them and let them squander it or manipulate it, and let it go as the money in the Frisco or in the New Haven went—into the pockets of profiteers; into the pockets of the men who robbed those railroads for their own private gain?

We now know of some needed reforms from our past experience. Is there a man in this House who does not know that we need a law in this country to regulate the issuance of railroad stocks and bonds? Not one that would dare stand here and say that this system of letting the railroad companies issue as many stocks and bonds as they wish, on their say-so, is just. They used to do that. The New Haven is an example. And the stockholders who have been robbed, the widows who have been made penniless, as the result of the treachery of the owners of some railroads, is a sufficient warning.

The gentleman from Illinois said that the railroad men are honest. There is Ripley, "the grand old man of the Santa Fe." I think he is honest. He will not rob his stockholders. No. But he is 70 years old. He has the confidence of the people, rich men as well as widows and the orphans who have put their money in his road. But there will be a successor to Mr. Ripley, and we ought to be sure that that successor can not do like the officials of the New Haven did when they robbed the investors. Are you going to turn the roads back to the private owners before you pass that kind of a law? That is just one of the needed laws that we know of now. Are you willing to say, gentleman, in all seriousness, that during this period of Federal control you will not learn something that ought to be done, different from what we have done in the past, in the control and management of the railroads? Do you not want to study the question? And these questions are not settled by you and me in the last analysis. Do you not want to hear from the folks at home? It is their money that we are voting into these roads. Why should you and I set the stop watch? Well, gentlemen, do not dodge it. We can not dodge it. This vote on the limitation means this: An advantage to one side or the other. You know what governmental inertia is. Why, we passed a bill through this House twice for the regulation of railroad stocks and bonds. I have been in Congress for five years, and nothing has come of it yet. Governmental inertia is hard. It takes time for the folks back home to understand and get to moving.

It means an advantage, gentlemen. Do not let them gloss it over and tell you it does not make any difference; that we can come together here in two years, and if we have not the right laws fixed up we can vote to extend the time. I have shown you why you can not do that. It can not be done. It means an advantage to one side or the other. You ask me what I mean by two sides. What is the use of dodging? I am not afraid of it, and you are not, either. The two sides are these on this question:

There are some people in this country who are so opposed to governmental ownership that they would turn the railroads back to the private owners, whether they could get the right kind of legislation to protect the people's interest or not, and trust to the future to remedy the wrong. They are here; they are just as honest and just as patriotic as I am, and I am not impugning their integrity. They may be right. Yet a vote to keep this limitation in the bill is a vote in favor of giving the advantage to the people who think that way.

Now, on the other hand, there are many of us here and many out in the country who think that it is better to keep these roads in the hands of the Government until we can get the right kind of remedial legislation that will protect the rights and the interests of the people of this country and protect the shippers and the consumers of the country as well as the investors.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. How does the Secretary of the Treasury feel about this measure in connection with this limitation?

Mr. DECKER. I do not speak for the Secretary of the Treasury, but I think I am justified in saying, and saying most emphatically, that the Secretary of the Treasury and also the member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Mr. Anderson, who wrote the bill, stated with the greatest force possible that the interests of our country demanded that there should be no limitation in this bill.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Might not the gentleman just as well go further and say what is the fact, in my judgment, that this limitation will in a measure foreclose the right of Congress to pass upon the final question of governmental ownership?

Mr. DECKER. Yes. You always say a thing better than I do. I thank you. I would not say "final foreclosure," but it puts them at a disadvantage, because they have got to move in the matter in a limited time. They have got to overcome what we call around here the "governmental inertia," this thing that prevents the actual enactment of legislation regarding the regulation of the issuance of stocks and bonds while every man in this House believes in the regulation as to the issuance of railroad stocks and bonds. Yet, despite the fact that the bill for that purpose has been reported by our committee, and I have been here five years, it has not passed yet. That is what I mean.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. Is it your thought, then, to experiment with the roads during this period?

Mr. DECKER. They are not your railroads, and they are not mine. We have taken them over. If you keep your eyes open, you have got to see an experiment.

Mr. SWEET. And that is your idea about it?

Mr. DECKER. And if you learn anything from the experiment I want you to have a chance to put it into effect after the war is over.

Mr. SWEET. And it is your thought and your argument, then, that that is one of the main things that ought not to be limited?

Mr. DECKER. I do not want you to put words in my mouth, because you are a skillful man. I know who you are. [Laughter.] I mean this: I mean you and I know and other people know the thing as well as we do. We should have done something before this to protect the investors in this country in the railroads. We knew this before the roads were taken over. I say we may learn something new during the period of Federal control; something, for instance, about whether it is better to pool the interests of the railroads, and whether there is too much competition, and whether there is too much duplication; and if we do, why limit the time for putting that knowledge into effect before you turn them back?

Mr. SWEET. You say you may learn something. That is true. Is that one of the main reasons why you are leaving off the limitation, that we may experiment during that period of Government control?

Mr. DECKER. That is a good and valid reason. That is all I need say for that reason.

Mr. SWEET. That is one of your main reasons?

Mr. DECKER. That is good enough for a main reason.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman says he is in favor of taking off the limitation. Will the gentleman tell the committee how the committee voted on this proposition?

Mr. DECKER. The vote stood 15 to 6, and I think the smartest men on the committee were for the limitation. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. That is good, coming from the gentleman from Missouri. [Laughter.]

Mr. DECKER. I will except the chairman. He was on our side. I will say that. The majority were against us. It may have been 15 to 6 or it may be 15 to 4. But it is a question you can understand as well as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That question is not hard to understand. That question is an important question. You can not say "I will follow the committee on this question," for the man who follows the plow will say, "Why did you foreclose my right to pass upon this question?" You can not follow anybody on this question, because the people are going to look into it, and they are going to say, "What did you do with our money during the time of war?"

There are some people, as I said before, that will want to get these roads back to private ownership if we put $5,000,000,000 into them, and they would give them back with mighty poor security for the $5,000,000,000 in order to avoid Government ownership.

They think Government ownership is an awful danger. There is no use in dodging it. But that does not mean Government ownership if you leave the question open. Some people believe in Government ownership. Some believe that perhaps the present system of Government control would be a good thing permanently. Some people believe that we ought to own the roadbeds and lease the roads to private individuals for operation.

There are many different theories as to how this would best be done, but the point I am making is this: I want to hear from the folks at home. I want my people to have a chance to speak, and I stand here in the House of Representatives and protest against the Congress foreclosing the people's right to speak or make it difficult for them to bring about needed reforms in this country. [Applause.] There are some people in this country who believed that we should have put that railroad stock and bond regulation measure through before those men had wrecked the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad. There are some who believe that we should have cheaper rates in this country and a larger Interstate Commerce Commission before we turn the railroads back. Should they not have a right to think it over? It may take the folks back home a long time to understand these things. We have been five years in trying to get through Congress a bill that almost everybody in this Congress believes in.

You say two years are a long enough time in which to pass needed legislation. That depends on how many other bills you have got to pass. There will be other questions troubling the hearts and the minds of the American people. There may be the good old tariff question. The economic situation throughout the world is being changed. The boys will be coming back from Europe. It may be that they will come back maimed and halt, though I hope not. The mothers' and fathers' hearts will be sad and torn, and we will be asked to make provision for these boys which will be adequate, so far as we have the ability. There will be many other questions. Some people say when this war is over, or even before it is concluded, we should change our military system and have universal military service. That may be a question and it may not. It depends on when the war is over and how the war shall end. Can you tell what questions will be for settlement, my friends? Then why say that in spite of what may be before us, this question must be settled in a given time. We are out on the sea; it is a stormy sea; we do not even know what port we will have to make. Why say that we have got to get into the harbor at a certain date?

Mr. RUSSELL. Why bind our own hands?

Mr. DECKER. Why bind our own hands when we have a herculean task to perform? Ah, my countrymen, they have talked here about many things, but I will tell you what I am afraid will happen. I am afraid the thing will happen that has happened before in the history of the world in time of war. I am afraid it will happen that the rich and the powerful—those who own these vast interests, who speculate in the stocks and bonds of railroads and wreck them sometimes—not always—I am afraid these men will again fatten and grow richer still on governmental favoritism; not because you are not as honest as I am, but because you limit the time for the people to act in their own interest. They will fatten on the public favoritism while the people's hearts at the close of the war are torn with anguish, and while their minds are distracted with many other problems than that of the railroad question. My friends, why set a limit here; why foreclose the right of my people to speak on this question? That is all I ask. Let the people rule. You need not worry. They will rule in the end, anyway. You and I need not try to set a limit to their power. It can not be done in this land of ours. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. ESCH. I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

By unanimous consent, Mr. LENROOT was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I intend to discuss chiefly the question whether the draftsman of this bill has expressed in proper phraseology the intention that the committee and the draftsman have; and I think before I get through I will be able to show that there are so many inaccuracies and absurdities in the bill as framed that it will be difficult, if not impossible, under the five-minute rule, to correct them.

But, Mr. Chairman, before going into that I do want to make a few preliminary general observations. The Interstate Commerce Commission has been charged with being responsible for the situation which existed that made it necessary for the Government to take over the railroads. I want to devote a few minutes to denying that charge, and think I will be able to show conclusively that the Interstate Commerce Commission is in no wise responsible for that condition.

It is true that railroad stocks have been going down, down, down for a long time past, but that is not due to the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is due in very large part to the reckless mismanagement of some railroads in this country, like the New Haven, the Rock Island, the Frisco, and other roads, whereby the great majority of the roads that are well managed have been compelled to suffer with them, because the investing public has become suspicious of all railroad stocks.

Secondly, it has been because in the efforts of these railroads to get the Interstate Commerce Commission to increase their rates they have for years been maintaining that they were not securing adequate rates upon which to pay a fair return upon their property. In every railroad station in the United States for the past three or four years you have seen notices posted up warning the public that the railroads were facing bankruptcy because of the inadequate rates that they were receiving. In the face of statements of that kind was it to be wondered at that the investing public of America believed what the railroads said, and therefore hesitated to invest their money in railroad stocks? Why, gentlemen, if a department store here in the city of Washington should advertise to-morrow that it was facing bankruptcy and that it was not making a fair income, and then the next day in another advertisement should ask the public of Washington to buy its stock, would it be wondered at if the public refused to buy that stock? Of course not. Now, the results show that upon every application that has been made by the railroads to the Interstate Commerce Commission, where that commission has denied the application to raise the rates, subsequent events have justified the action of the commission. To prove that, I need only to point to the fact that whereas the railroads claimed that they were facing bankruptcy because of inadequate rates, the last two fiscal years, 1916 and 1917, were the most prosperous years in the history of the railroads. So that it is not correct to state that the necessity of taking over the roads was due to the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

But I do not for a moment mean to say that it was all due to lack of proper management upon the part of the railroads. There was one thing that Congress ought to have done just as soon as war was declared, and if we had had any independence in Congress, if we had had the courage to assert for ourselves the right to initiate legislation relating to the war, just as soon as war was declared we would have repealed the antipooling statutes relating to railroads during the existence of the war. But we have got into such a condition in both Houses of Congress that Congress does not dare initiate or suggest any legislation, but must wait for the President to initiate everything. But the President did not ever suggest to Congress that during the war the antipooling statutes should be repealed.

Another reason for the condition that arose is this: Last year Congress passed what was known as the priority statute, permitting the President to give orders for preference upon the railroads to commodities necessary to prosecute the war. The intention of Congress was good, the intention of Congress was to expedite the war. But how was it administered? Because of the absolute incompetency in the administration of that priority statute, instead of expediting the war it actually hampered it. And the fact is that upon one railroad, one of the main railroads of this country, the administrative side of this Government issued priority orders covering 85 per cent of the entire traffic of that road. Was it to be wondered at that there was chaos on that railroad, and the proof is that the moment Mr. McAdoo assumed the control of the railroads he repealed every priority order that had been issued.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Is it not a fact that there were four or five organizations here in Washington all issuing priority orders?

Mr. LENROOT. There were. I want to say in advance that there is so much ground to cover that I must decline to yield to interruptions. Another reason for the conditions that existed is that it was not because of lack of money that the railroads could not secure locomotive equipment; it was because of the inability to secure them, although they had plenty of money. The crying need in railway transportation of this country was locomotives. They gave their orders to the factories in this country for the construction of locomotives, but through the action of the Government preference was given to France, preference was given to England, and preference was given to Russia. That was justified at the time, but there was a time, months ago, when every preference order, so far as Russia was concerned, should have been repealed by the Government, and the American locomotive factories should have been permitted to go on and construct locomotives for American railroads, which they refused to do. [Applause.]

So when we come to analyze the cause for this congestion the fault is not wholly with the railroads, the fault is not wholly with Congress, the fault is not wholly with the administrative side of the Government, but the fault is with all three of these sources, and not that of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, with reference to the bill I want to take a few moments on a few controverted propositions. First as to compensation: I believe that the compensation provided in this bill is extremely liberal; but, on the other hand, I am not at all certain that the compensation that is permitted in this bill is any greater than the railroads would be entitled to under the law. I can not go into that, but I do want to call attention to the fact that this bill as framed does not fix the compensation to which the railroads will be entitled; it fixes merely the maximum which the President may agree with the railroads to pay. That it is generous can easily be proven in the case of some railroads. I shall insert in my remarks a table prepared by the statistical division of the Interstate Commerce Commission, giving the returns upon capital stock of all railroads in the country paying over 5 per cent in dividends. If the President shall see fit to grant the maximum to railroads that this bill provides, he would grant to the Pennsylvania Railroad a return upon their capital stock of 8.92 per cent. To the Pennsylvania Company 11.90, to the Philadelphia & Reading 25.70, to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad 32 per cent upon their capital stock. I shall not take the time to read the list, but I want to call attention to some of the smaller roads as to what they will be permitted to receive.

The Duluth, Missabe & Northern Railroad up in the section where I live would be entitled, if the President chooses to give the maximum which the bill permits, to receive 114 per cent on its capital stock.

Now, remember that this provision is permissive only. If the President sees fit to allow some of these railroads these exorbitant returns, that responsibility will be his and not ours. We have the right to assume that inasmuch as we will unquestionably have to pay many roads more than the returns provided, that the President in making these agreements will see to it that the maximum amount of some of these roads shall be cut down.

But some one may say, if these roads are legally entitled under the law to these great returns, ought they not to have it? In reply to that I will say that they may be legally entitled to that large return, but if they stand on their legal rights the President ought to stand on his rights, which is permitted in the bill, and say to them, "If you will not make a fair agreement with me, you can go into the Court of Claims and we will not pay you a dollar until they make an award."

Now, I want to say a few words about the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to finally pass upon these rates or whether the President shall have the right, as is proposed in the bill as it now stands, to exercise that power. I want to read a line or two from the report of the committee. The majority report of the committee says:

> The rate fabric of the country is now based upon the competitive system.

I understand that the gentleman who drafted this bill was not a Member of this House and was not a Member of the Senate, but one Mr. George W. Anderson, a new member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and, as I think I shall be able to demonstrate a little later, anyone who could draft a bill with the inaccuracies that are found in the bill itself—it is not to be wondered at if mistakes might be made in the report if it was written by the same gentleman. Because I can not believe that my good friend, the chairman of the committee, who has a thorough knowledge of railways and of the interstate commerce law, would deliberately make the statement that I have read—"the rate fabric of the country is now based upon the competitive system."

Why, the gentleman knows that the very purpose of the interstate commerce law was to prevent that competitive condition that arose before regulation.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission is allowed to lower the rates——

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, if the gentleman will be patient, I assure him that I will discuss that question in a few minutes. I will come to it in a moment or two, but I want to take my own time and my own way in doing so. The competitive theory that the interstate commerce law was designed to prevent and did prevent was the old system, where, for instance, the Pennsylvania Railroad would go to a man in Washington that had a shipment to make and say, "If you will give it to our road, we will carry it for so much." The Baltimore & Ohio would go to the same man and say, "We will carry it cheaper than the Pennsylvania." That was one of the things that the law was designed to prevent.

That is one of the things which it was designed to prevent, and the very purpose and scheme, instead of compelling a competition of rates, was to secure uniformity of rates, and now I come to the question that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asks. He says, Has not the Interstate Commerce Commission frequently permitted a lower rate where there is water competition? I say yes; but the gentleman does not seem to make the distinction between the Interstate Commerce Commission ordering a rate and permitting a rate, and the distinction ought to be made.

Mr. SHERLEY. But is not the gentleman making the mistake of confusing rebating with competition? They are not synonymous.

Mr. LENROOT. And I ask the gentleman, does he think that under existing circumstances the old practice can be continued? I am not speaking of rebating at all. Rebating means where they assume to charge the same rate and then pay back a portion of the rate charged.

Mr. SHERLEY. The illustration the gentleman used was certainly a rebating illustration.

Mr. LENROOT. It is not. A rebating instance is not where the Pennsylvania says, "I will carry your product for so much," and the Baltimore & Ohio says that it will do it for a lower rate. A rebating proposition is where they both on the face of it make the same charge, but one pays back a portion of the rate charged.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is not the only rebating situation. I do not want to take the gentleman's time——

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. Just one other suggestion, and I am through. Does not the gentleman think that most of the rates that are now in existence are rates that were initiated by the railroads, as the result of competition, but which have been in a manner modified here and there by the commission?

Mr. LENROOT. And I shall ask the gentleman—and he is one of the most distinguished men in the House—does he agree with the statement that the present railroad rates as a whole are based on competition?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and no. I agree to it as much as I disagree with the gentleman's statement that they are not at all based on competition, because that statement is, in my judgment, just as far from the facts.

Mr. LENROOT. No; the Interstate Commerce Commission, in any order that it has ever made, never has made a rate saying to one railroad, "You must put into effect this rate so that you will compete with another rate."

Mr. SHERLEY. No; but it has permitted it because of competitive conditions.

Mr. LENROOT. And the gentleman then makes the distinction. The committee in this report is very clear that they contend the scheme of railroad regulation by Interstate Commerce Commission is to compel competitive rates. But there is a distinction between compelling competitive rates and permitting them.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman does not want to insinuate that anybody has ever contended that there was a compulsory competitive rate system, but a permissive rate system—that is, one railroad may reduce its rates honestly and fairly, not simply to crush another, and it has the right to do so.

Mr. LENROOT. I may have gotten that idea from the gentleman's report, if it had not been that he stated later in the report that if we should give the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to control these matters it would be necessary to entirely rewrite the Interstate Commerce Commission law, because he says that law was based on competition, which is the thing that I deny.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; competitive agencies fighting for the freight.

Mr. LENROOT. It permits competition, but it does not in any line or sentence command it. And again, and I can only take a moment upon this, the gentleman says in his report that there should be a different basis now that the railroads are under the control of the Government. But the gentleman's bill says that the basis of the rates fixed by the President shall be such rates as are reasonable and just, and he has used exactly the same language—the same words—that are used in the interstate-commerce act that is the guiding rule for the Interstate Commerce Commission. The rule is identical in both cases.

Mr. ESCH. With one exception. The bill uses the word "fair," and that is not used in the interstate-commerce act, and I have never been able to understand why it was used in the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Nor I; and coming now to an analysis of the bill, I want to acquit the committee of any criticism that I shall make concerning the various sections of the bill, because I realize that the committee did not go over this bill section by section with a view of determining whether its phraseology expressed the intent that they had in the bill. That is conclusively proven, because many of the same errors I shall point out existing in the House bill now before the House are also found in the Senate bill now before the Senate. I realize very well that the committee spent all of its time practically in considering the great controverted questions in the bill, and they assumed that the drafter of this bill knew what he was about in drafting the bill, and all I care to say is that in that respect the committee, greatly as I respect them, have been the victims of misplaced confidence, as I think I shall be able to show. In the very first section of the bill it recites that the President, having in time of war taken over certain railroads, "called herein carriers," is authorized to agree with and guarantee to such carriers, and so forth. This is not very important, except to show the reckless carelessness upon the part of the drafter of the bill. What is it that the President took over? Did he take over the Pennsylvania Railroad Corporation? Did he take over any railroad corporation? No. He took over certain physical property and nothing more, and the drafter of this bill says that physical property that we have taken over we shall hereafter in the bill call "the carrier," and then he goes to say that the President is authorized to agree with such carrier to pay it so much money.

Why, gentlemen, if you give me the possession of a horse and I say to you, "I will agree to pay that horse so much for the use of it," what would you think of it? And yet that is exactly what has happened in this bill. We have agreed to pay an inanimate thing, physical property, make an agreement with physical property to pay it so much money. Then we go on two or three lines further and provide that during the period of such Federal control it shall receive a just compensation not exceeding an annual sum. Now, what is the agreement the President is authorized to make in this section? That they shall receive a fixed sum? No. The language is that he is authorized to agree with the Pennsylvania Railroad, we will say, that while your road is under Federal control I will guarantee that you will not get from the Government more than so much. What do you think that agreement would be worth? How much value do you think it would be to the railroads? What railroad do you think would enter into such an agreement as that? Now, I want to say that this absurdity is due to an amendment upon the suggestion of the committee, as I find from the hearings, made by the drafter of the bill, because in the first bill which was introduced we find no such anomaly. There it was provided that they shall receive as a just income the income at an annual rate equivalent to, and so forth. That was fixed, that was certain, but they have inserted here "not exceeding," and the purpose as developed from the hearings was to authorize the President to make any agreement that he might choose below that sum. In other words, that the authority to the President is that he shall not pay them more than so much under this agreement. Then we go on, "not exceeding an annual sum (herein called standard return)." Now, what is a standard return under the bill? It is this maximum sum that the President is authorized to fix, but later on all through the bill the standard return has been treated not as a sum which the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes, but a sum which the President is authorized to agree upon, so if the President should agree with the Pennsylvania Railroad for a less sum than this maximum sum, that provision in the bill for reduction from the standard return would have no application whatever. Then—I only touch upon a few of these things—if you will turn to page 2, line 4, with reference to including the income of railroads leased to or acquired by another road during this three-year period, we find the language, "including therein such income of lines acquired by." "Such income." What does "such" refer to? The preceding language is, "they shall be entitled to the average annual operating income," and then it says, "but there shall be included such income." What? Such average annual operating income? That is impossible, because this bracket provides that it shall apply only to roads that are acquired during this period, and no such road can have a three-year income to secure an average.

Does it mean that all incomes of these roads shall be included? It can not mean that, because the theory of this bill is that only net operating railway incomes would be included. Evidently what the framers of the bill intended was that a road making operating returns in 1915 and acquired by another road in 1916 and 1917, the revenue from that acquired road would all be reflected in the operating return of the road acquiring it; but during 1916, when it did make operating return, the rate there should be added to the revenues of the road with which we are dealing—the revenues of that road during that period of 1915, and then, adding them all together and dividing by three, we get the standard return for the road with which we are dealing. But the bracket clearly does not say that and it could not be so considered. Then there is another very little matter—lines 11 and 12—in reference to the rate per annum to be fixed by the President from the cost of any additions or betterments, where we find the words, "less retirements or road extensions." You readily see it clearly was not the intention to have him deduct the cost of road extensions, but to allow them a rate per cent upon the cost of those road extensions; but as this reads, he would be compelled to deduct the cost of road extensions, and that is an error.

Mr. ESCH. It is a typographical error, owing to the misplacing of a comma. I called attention to it in the committee and thought it had been corrected, but evidently it is still retained in the print of the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. In lines 14, 15, and 16, "that any railway operating income accruing during the period of Federal control in excess of such standard return shall remain the property of the United States." Now what does that mean? Section 1 provides that this shall be payable in annual installments, thereby clearing implying that all revenues of these roads belong to the Government, but when you say "remain the property of the United States" you clearly get another conclusion. The original bill very properly said it should be the property of the United States, and I think there ought to be in this bill a clear declaration that all operating revenues shall be the moneys of the United States, and I shall offer at the proper time an amendment to that effect. Immediately following that, "in excess of such standard return." Suppose the President makes an agreement with the road for less than the standard return, and this language says that moneys in excess of the standard return shall remain the property of the United States. Whose money is it—the difference between the standard return and the amount that the President fixed in the agreement? Then, again it says, "and that each carrier so agreeing shall thereby become subject to all the provisions of this act." Later on there are many important provisions that are clearly intended, it seems to me from reading the hearings, to apply to all roads whether they are agreeing roads or not, and yet this language very clearly implies that the carrier is not bound by any of the provisions of this act unless he enters into an agreement, because it expressly says that the carrier agreeing to do that shall be bound by the provisions of the act.

Now, I have got to hurry along. I can only touch the more important points. But upon the same page it says:

> In the computation of such income, debits and credits, arising from the accounts called in the monthly reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the equipment rents and joint facility rents shall be included.

Now, under the President's proclamation he has not taken over any street railway or interurban railway, and as their revenue will be included in the operating returns of these carriers the commission's duty will be to ascertain that standard return. There certainly should be a provision excluding from those operating revenues any revenue of any road that was not taken over by the Government.

And then on the same page the commission is limited in ascertaining the cost of betterments and road extensions to reports, books, and other pertinent data of such character. Will anyone tell me that if the President orders a million dollars expended on betterments why the commission should be confined to the books and data of the railroad company to ascertain the cost? Ought they not to be permitted to find and ascertain that cost wherever they can?

Then the provision on page 3 with reference to taxes—and I am very much surprised to find the matter of taxes dealt with in this form:

> Every such agreement shall provide that any Federal taxes—

And so forth. And it provides for the exclusion of war taxes, but you can not find one word in this bill relative to taxes except taxes upon agreeing roads. What about the roads that do not agree, that do not enter into an agreement? Who is to pay the taxes there? There is no prohibition in this bill. And under the classification accounts of the Interstate Commerce Commission, except for the exclusion by this bill of war taxes, every dollar will be included in the operating expenses, and under this bill the Government will pay the war taxes of any road that does not make an agreement.

And then—> not including, however, assessments for public improvements—

And so forth. That is not to be taken out of operating revenues. Why should it not? Are you going to deprive the municipalities throughout the Nation, who have levied special taxes against a railway, from collecting in the usual way those taxes, even though they be special assessments? Can anybody give any reason why that should be done? How will they collect them if they can not be paid out of operating revenues? Where we have taken over all the physical properties, all that there may be in the taxing jurisdiction that they can reach, is that property. What, of course, should be done is to permit the paying of those taxes, but instead of being charged to operating expenses they should be charged to betterments and capital account as they are now under the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Then, in section 2, and there are many matters I have to pass over—in section 2:

> That if no such agreement is made the President may nevertheless pay to any carrier while under Federal control an annual amount, payable in reasonable installments, not exceeding 90 per cent of the estimated annual amount of just compensation.

I want to ask why there should not be the same maximum of standard return that the President is authorized to pay voluntarily in this case that there is in the case where the railroads agree? The same limitation should be placed upon the President.

And then, in section 3:

> Failing such agreement, either the United States or such carrier may file a petition in the Court of Claims for the purpose of final ascertainment of the amount of such just compensation.

I merely want to call attention here to the fact that the bill contemplates betterments and improvements being made from time to time, and it should be provided that the Court of Claims may open that award and revise it at any time where the President may be unable to agree upon the compensation that they receive.

And then in the very next section they provide:

> That the just compensation that may be determined as hereinbefore provided by agreement or that may be adjudicated by the Court of Claims shall be increased by an amount reckoned at a reasonable rate per centum to be fixed by the President upon the cost of any additions and betterments.

Is there any lawyer in the House who will say that the return the carrier is entitled to receive upon the cost of betterments and additions is not just as much a judicial question, that the President can not be given power to finally determine, as the initial question, as to the amount of compensation that the railroad should receive? Of course, we can not delegate to the President any such power as that which is attempted in this section.

And again, in section 5, here is a prohibition upon the dividends that may be paid by railroads during the period of Federal control. I would like to have some lawyer in this House tell me what authority we have to say to any carrier that it shall not pay dividends during this period of Federal control, dividends that have been earned, it may be, and to be paid out of earnings that may have been made prior to the date of taking over under Federal control. What possible power have we over it? It is their money. What right have we to deal with it? And, indeed, it is very questionable whether we have any power to deal with their right to pay dividends out of this compensation that we pay them. They are entitled under the law to a reasonable compensation for the value of the use. I very much doubt whether we have any right to say what they shall do with the money that the law says they are entitled to receive.

I want to stop at section 9 for a moment, which relates to the short-line railroads. I asked some questions about that during the debate, and was told that that clearly did restrict the power of the President that he might otherwise have. But, then, we come in the next section to—

That nothing herein contained shall be construed as modifying or restricting the powers heretofore conferred upon the President.

What does that mean? In the very section preceding that they tell us they have restricted the powers of the President, and in the second line of the next section they say that nothing in this act shall be construed as doing that which they have in the section before tried to do.

Then, in section 11, and a most important section, it gives to injured individuals the right to sue these railroads. But on line 2 of page 12 we find that, if it is inconsistent with any order of the President they shall not have the right to sue. What does that mean? It means the President, under the language of this bill, can absolutely deny any relief to any injured party. It means more than that. It means that if the President says that under the interstate-commerce law safety-appliance laws are violated, if hours of service are violated, if injury occurs through the negligence of the Director General of the Railroads himself, there can be no remedy if the President so orders. Why, gentlemen, here is a power expressly recognized, that makes the President over and above not only this law but all laws, and it ought not to be considered for a single moment. So upon the question of interstate commerce. The committee report pleads that the President ought not to be overruled, that it would be "most unseemly"—I think that is the language—to permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to overrule him.

I want to say a word about the powers of the President. The President of the United States has no power, under this law, or under the law delegating to him the power to take over the railroads, that he exercises by virtue of his office in the sense that it is delegating to him a power that we could not delegate to anybody else. We could delegate this power to any official of the United States, and in carrying out this act the President is exercising only a delegated power, and in exercising that delegated power he is no greater by being President of the United States than the Interstate Commerce Commission. I hope we have not come to the point yet in this country where we are going to invoke the old doctrine that "the King can do no wrong." [Applause.] That seems to be the attitude of the committee.

Then they provide that no defense shall be made thereto on the ground that the carrier is the instrumentality or agency of the Federal Government. I am sure that there is not a lawyer who will say, upon reflection, that that would stand before any court in the country in a case where, except for this, they would have the right to interpose that defense.

Supposing, for instance, the Director General of the railroads orders a railroad to put defective cars in its trains, and because of that defect an employee is injured, and then he sues the carrier, and you say to the carrier, "You shall not interpose the defense that you are an instrumentality or agency of the United States." Have you not attempted to deprive the defendant of the constitutional right of proving that the fact of negligence was not that of himself, but that of his superior acting under a lawful order?

Oh, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] shakes his head. But I undertake to say that the gentleman can find no case in the books that will make the agent liable for the negligence of the principal in this kind of a case so as to relieve the principal.

Now, there is only one way in which that can be cured, to my mind, and that is by adding a provision to the effect that any judgment or award that may be made as the result of such suit shall be paid either out of the operating revenue or the revolving fund, so that the railroad company will become only a nominal defendant and thereby it will not be permitted to make this defense.

Mr. SIMS. There is no controversy on that, that I know of.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not find it in the gentleman's bill, so I suppose there is some question about it.

Mr. SIMS. As to everything that we did not prohibit or that comes in the law, we did not have to detail it in all its ramifications.

Mr. LENROOT. Do you say the railroad is not liable for the enforcement of the judgment that otherwise would not be rendered against it? I will have an amendment to offer when the time comes, if I can get consideration of it.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. DECKER. I do not understand that it is not payable out of the operating expenses of the road.

Mr. LENROOT. For the reason that the judgment may be levied upon nonoperating revenue. If the negligence is not that of itself, but that of the Government, it can not be deprived of making that defense unless we expressly provide for the payment of the award in the manner I suggest. That is the point. [Applause.]

I am sorry that because of the expiration of my time I can not discuss other matters in the bill. I insert the table referred to in the early part of my remarks. I also insert some suggested amendments to perfect the bill.

Road.	Capital stock actually outstanding (average for the 3 years ended June 30, 1917).	Average net income for the 3 years ended June 30, 1917.	Average per cent of net income to capital stock.

AMENDMENTS INTENDED TO BE PROPOSED.

Page 1, line 6, strike out the words "called herein carrier" and the parentheses.

Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "any such carrier" and insert "the owner of any such railroad or system."

Page 5, after line 19, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Wherever used in this act the word 'owner' includes any person, corporation, partnership, or association who, during any portion of the period of Federal control of a railroad or system of transportation would be entitled to the possession, use, and control of such railroad or system in the absence of Federal control thereof. Wherever in this act reference is made to the period of Federal control in connection with an owner, it shall be taken to refer to the portion of such period during which such owner, but for such Federal control, would have been entitled to the possession, use, and control of the railroad or system of transportation."

Page 1, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "making operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission" and insert "for which operating returns were made to the Interstate Commerce Commission during the three years ending June 30, 1917."

Page 2, strike out all after the semicolon in line 14, through the semicolon in line 16.

Page 7, after line 21, insert a new section numbered "5" and to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That moneys and other property derived from the operation of the railroads or systems of transportation during Federal control are hereby declared to be the property of the United States. Unless otherwise directed by the President, such moneys shall not be covered into the Treasury, but such moneys and property shall remain in the custody of the same officers and the accounting thereof shall be in the same manner and form as before Federal control. Disbursements therefrom shall, without further appropriation, be made in the same manner as before Federal control, and for such purposes as under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917, are chargeable to operating expenses or to railway tax accruals, and for such other purposes in connection with Federal control as the President may direct, except that taxes under Titles I and II of the act entitled 'An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes,' approved October 3, 1917, or any act in addition thereto or in amendment thereof, shall be paid by the owner out of his own funds. If Federal control begins or ends during the tax year for which any taxes so chargeable to railway tax accruals are assessed, the taxes for such year shall be apportioned to the date of the beginning or ending of such Federal control and disbursements shall be made only for that portion of such taxes as is due for the part of such tax year which falls within the period of Federal control.

"Such custody and disbursement shall, however, be subject to the direction of the President, and all officers and employees having custody or control of any of such moneys or property shall be subject to all criminal laws regarding the custody and control of public moneys or property so far as not inconsistent herewith.

"At such periods as the President may direct the books shall be closed and the balance of revenues over disbursements shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the revolving fund created by this act. If such revenues are insufficient to meet such disbursements, the deficit shall be paid out of such revolving fund in such manner as the President may direct."

Page 2, strike out all after the word "States," in line 16, through the word "act," in line 18, and, on page 5, after line 19, and before the paragraph inserted by a previous amendment, insert the following as a separate paragraph:

"The agreement shall also provide that the owner shall accept all the terms and conditions of this act and any regulation or order made by or through the President under authority of this act or of that portion of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes,' approved August 29, 1916, which authorizes the President in time of war to take possession, assume control, and utilize systems of transportation; and that in case of failure to observe such terms and conditions or such regulations or orders, any further payments under the agreement may be suspended or forfeited."

Page 2, line 21, before the period, insert a comma and the following: "but debits and credits arising from the operation of such street electric passenger railways, including railways commonly called interurbans, as are at the time of the agreement not under Federal control shall be excluded."

Page 2, line 24, to page 3, line 1, strike out "from the reports, books, and other pertinent data of such carrier."

Page 3, line 5, to page 4, line 2, strike out the whole paragraph and insert:

"Every such agreement shall provide that all taxes assessed for the period of Federal control (which but for such Federal control would under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917, be deducted from 'net income from railway operations' in determining 'railway operating income') shall, except as hereinafter provided, be paid from operating revenue or, if that is insufficient for the purpose, then from the revolving fund created by this act; that if Federal control begins or ends during the tax year for which any taxes may be assessed, the taxes for such year shall be apportioned to the date of the beginning or ending of such Federal control, and the foregoing provisions shall apply only to that portion of such taxes which is due for the part of such tax year which falls within the period of Federal control; and that the owner shall pay from his own funds all other taxes, including the taxes under Titles I and II of the act entitled 'An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes,' approved October 3, 1917, or any act in addition thereto or in amendment thereof."

Page 4, after line 23, insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"Every such agreement shall also provide that each owner shall receive during the period of Federal control an annual sum equivalent to a fair percentage upon the cost of additions and betterments, less retirements and road extensions, made on or in connection with such railroad or system during the period of Federal control by the owner, with the approval or by the order of the President, plus a fair percentage upon the amount expended by the owner, during the period of Federal control for taxes chargeable under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917, to investment in road and equipment and for assessments for public improvements. Such fair percentage in the case of expenditures made out of borrowed money shall be equal to the rate at which such money is borrowed, and in other cases shall be fixed by the President at the time the expenditure is made. The cost of such additions, betterments, and road extensions, the amount of such retirements, and the amounts expended for such taxes and assessments shall be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission and certified by it to the President. The amounts so certified shall, for the purpose of the agreement, be conclusive."

Page 4, after line 23 (and after the paragraph already inserted), insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"Every such agreement shall also provide that the United States will pay to the owner any loss accruing to such owner by reason of any additions, betterments, or road extensions made during the period of Federal control by the President, or made during such period at the order of or with the approval of the President by such owner or by the person, corporation, partnership or association entitled to the possession, use, and control of the railroad or system of transportation at the time such additions, betterments, or road extensions are made. The amount of such loss shall be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission and certified by it to the President. The amount so certified shall, for the purpose of the agreement, be conclusive."

Page 6, line 1, after the period insert:

"The estimated annual amount of just compensation, in the case of an owner with whom the President is authorized to agree under section 1, shall not exceed the annual amount which he is authorized under that section to agree that the owner shall receive."

Page 6, line 1, strike out all after the period through the word "and" in line 3.

Page 6, line 3, strike out all beginning with the comma, through line 5, and insert a period and the following:

"The acceptance of any benefits under this section shall constitute an acceptance by the owner of all the provisions of this act and shall obligate the owner to pay to the United States, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from a date or dates fixed in proceedings under section 3, the amount by which the sums received under this section exceed the sum found due in such proceedings."

Page 6, line 18, after the period insert the following:

"In case of disobedience to a subpœna, the board may invoke the aid of any district court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence, and such court within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any person, corporation, partnership, or association, issue an order requiring appearance before the board, or the production of documentary evidence if so ordered, or the giving of evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof."

Page 7, line 9, strike out the word "final" and at the end of line 12 insert the following:

"The Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to render its award in such form as it may deem proper and to provide for the reopening of its award, and for the award of such further compensation as may be found due because of conditions arising after the making of the original award."

Page 9, lines 6–12, strike out the entire paragraph and insert the following:

"If, in proceedings under section 3, neither the award of the Court of Claims nor the agreement makes provision therefor, the President may nevertheless pay, if he deems it just, out of the revolving fund (to the owner of any railroad or system of transportation or to any person, corporation, partnership, or association, who at the termination of Federal control of such railroad or system is or will become by reason of rights existing at such time entitled to the possession, use, and control thereof) any loss accruing by reason of any additions, betterments, or road extensions on or in connection with such railroad or system of transportation made during the period of Federal control by the President or made during such period by the owner at the order or with the approval of the President."

Page 9, line 21, strike out all of the line and through the period on line 9 of page 10 and insert the following:

"SEC. —. That an owner may, during the period of Federal control, issue only such bonds, notes, equipment trust certificates, stock, and other forms of securities, secured or unsecured by mortgage, as the President may approve as consistent with the public interest. The President may, out of the revolving fund, purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities at prices not exceeding par, and thereafter any securities so purchased shall be held by the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, under the direction of the President, represent the United States in all matters in connection therewith in the same manner as a private security holder. Any income from such securities shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The President may direct that such securities, or any portion thereof, be sold whenever in his judgment it is desirable, at prices not less than the cost thereof, and the proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

Page 10, after line 25, insert a new paragraph, to read as follows:

"No person employed in connection with the operation of railroads or systems of transportation under Federal control (except those persons referred to in the preceding paragraph of this section) shall be deemed to be an officer or employee under the United States for the purpose of Title II of the act entitled 'An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes,' approved October 3, 1917, commonly called 'war excess-profits tax,' nor shall he be deemed to be a civil employee of the United States within the meaning of the act entitled 'An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes,' approved September 7, 1916."

Page 11, line 1, strike out the words "nothing in this act shall be construed to" and insert "the President in the exercise of the authority given to him by this act or by the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes,' approved August 29, 1916, shall not."

Page 11, section 10, strike out the first sentence.

Page 12, line 2, strike out the words "or with any order of the President."

Page 12, line 11, at the end of the line insert the following:

"The President shall by regulation provide for the payment, out of the operating revenue derived from Federal control, or if that is insufficient, out of the revolving fund, of any judgments or awards and for the enforcement of any decrees or orders that may be rendered against such owners in any suit of such a character that but for Federal control (a) could be brought against the owner of any railroad or system of transportation, and (b) any amount paid in compromise thereof or in satisfaction of a judgment or decree therein that could be charged to operating expenses or to railway tax accruals under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917. The President shall also provide for the payment, out of operating revenues or out of the revolving fund, of any loss accruing to any owner by reason of any process levied against any property of such owner in connection with any suit of the character above described."

Page 15, strike out all of lines 6 and 7 and insert the following: "the termination of Federal control of the railroads or systems of transportation affected by such judgment or decree."

Page 16, after line 4, insert a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. —. That if any provision of this act or the application of such provision to certain circumstances is held unconstitutional the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to circumstances other than those as to which it has been held unconstitutional shall not be affected thereby."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when this discussion started I did not intend to take any time under the general debate, preferring to use what time I did use under the five-minute rule. But on account of some statements that have been made and some arguments that have been made, especially about two controverted points in this bill, I thought I would probably want more than five minutes in which to discuss them, and I did not want to ask for an extension of time under the five-minute rule.

I am one of those, Mr. Chairman, who believe that in this time of war, when we have pledged the President of the United States every resource of the Government toward the prosecution of this war, we should grant to the President every necessary power in legislation that he asks.

I have so voted, and according to my conception of that theory I shall vote upon this bill and upon every amendment proposed to this bill. And I want to say here and now, with as much emphasis as I can command, that if this war is not carried on successfully, if there are any mistakes made, it will not be the fault of the Congress of the United States, for the simple reason that every necessary power that this administration has asked for, every necessary dollar and more that this administration has asked for since the declaration of war has been generously and with alacrity provided for. [Applause.]

I therefore am in favor, as my colleagues are in favor, of granting in this bill the necessary legislation, after we have given the President the right to take the railroads. After he has taken the railroads that question admits of no debate. The question of whether or not the President should have taken the railroads under the law passed authorizing him to take them is not a question here now. The President or the Government of the United States under our action has taken over the railroads of this country. Under this bill and under our action here it is our purpose and it is our duty to give the legislation that is necessary in order that he may carry out successfully the operation of these railroads during these war times.

And another thing that I want to emphasize in the beginning of the few remarks I shall make is that I do not want this House to forget during the consideration of this bill, either under general debate or under the five-minute rule, that this is a war measure, and that its operation should terminate as soon after the close of the war as is possible. [Applause.]

I shall vote for this bill, and I have tried to perfect it upon that theory, and upon that theory only. It is not candid for men to get up before this House and say that since we have taken over the railroads under only one power, and that is the war power, we should hold them after the war to try one nostrum after another. [Applause.] I therefore shall vote for a limitation of time.

There are three important provisions of this bill, I think. One is the question of compensation, another is the question of the power to make rates and who shall exercise that power, and the other is the time after the war at which we should turn these railroads back to their owners.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the compensation provided in this bill is as nearly just as we could make it. I do not believe that we are more than just to the railroads of this country at this time. I believe that the compensation provided in this bill, taking the average of the three years' earnings of the railroads, is just, as nearly as we can get it, both to the Government and to the railroads. I therefore shall support that section of this bill in its present form, unless I hear arguments more forceful against its passage than any that I have heard up to this time. We have taken the property of these people under a law passed by this Congress—not of their asking. We have taken these properties under that law, not because they asked that they be taken, but because the President of the United States believed that after all of the congestion that we had had, after all of the tying up of the roads of this country, it was absolutely the only thing that could be done. That was to take the railroads under the law that we had passed and to operate them.

For 30 years in the different States of this country and since 1887 the different State commissions and the Interstate Commerce Commission have been built up. As I said in the outset, I believe that every necessary power should be granted to the President to manage this situation. I do not believe that the power for the President to initiate rates and that the rate he initiates shall be final is a power necessary to the successful operating of the railroads by the President during this war time. It may be that the President should have the power and the right in special cases, for the movement of troops and supplies for the Army and the Navy, to make rates and to make them final for those specific cases, and I am willing to grant him that power. The amendment that I offered to this bill in the committee, which was lost on a vote of 9 to 9, a tie vote, provided that the President of the United States in special cases might finally fix the rates as to the transportation of anything that affected the movement of the Army and Navy and the supplies for the Army and Navy; but it said that as for other rates and for general rates the same powers that had controlled them in the past should control them during this war time. Men said that that amendment was a reflection upon the President of the United States; that he, representing the people, would have uppermost in his mind the best interests of all the people of the land. Nobody subscribes more fully to that doctrine than I do. Nobody has greater faith in the Director General of Railroads and in his great ability than I have. But I know that neither the Director General nor the President of the United States will have time to try this case as it should be tried before rates are to be initiated and put into effect. They will both be compelled to consult somebody, some man or set of men who are or should be experts on these matters. Who, then, would say that the Interstate Commerce Commission is not the proper body whose advice should be sought? We should give the President power to initiate rates; and who argues that when the President initiated a rate and suggested to the commission that he believed a certain rate was fair, reasonable, and just that that argument would not be very persuasive with the commission and would be adopted unless it could be proven that it was most unjust and injurious?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman, as I understand it, endeavored to get a provision into the bill giving the President the power to fix rates only as to supplies and leave the rates for all other commodities to be fixed as at present. Is that the idea?

Mr. RAYBURN. No.

Mr. BORLAND. What was the statement that the gentleman made?

Mr. RAYBURN. I said that the President's order would be final in a case like that, that he would not have to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission; but as a general proposition I want the President, having the railroads now and being in the position that the railroads have formerly been, to occupy the same position with reference to rates that the railroads have formerly occupied with reference to rates, and leave the final passage upon the reasonableness and justice of the rates to the Interstate Commerce Commission, where it has been in the past.

Mr. BORLAND. Then I correctly understood the gentleman.

Mr. RAYBURN. I agree that the President should be allowed to initiate all rates, but I say that the Interstate Commerce Commission should have the veto power upon them the same as it has now, except as to rates for the Army and Navy and for supplies for them.

Mr. BORLAND. Then I correctly understood the gentleman that he made a distinction between rates affecting the movement of troops and supplies and general commodity rates?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Then where does the gentleman make that distinction, in view of the wide control that is now exercised over all industrial operations in this country? Would he include fuel? Would he include wheat? Would he include cotton? Where would he make his distinction as to what constituted supplies for the troops?

Mr. RAYBURN. I would not enumerate. I think it is pretty generally understood what supplies are necessary for the Army and the Navy. I think that is pretty generally understood among the people.

Mr. BORLAND. I have not been able to distinguish what was necessary as supplies for the Army and Navy. They embrace pretty nearly everything that this country produces.

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, well, by the same course of reasoning you could broaden anything to cover everything upon the earth. That provision in this bill ought to be amended, or ought to be stricken out of the bill. This provision in the bill with reference to rates provides that the President can initiate the rates, that they go into effect, but if anybody within 30 days files a complaint the Interstate Commerce Commission can give a full hearing and make a report, but that that report will have no effect except to be persuasive, probably. I do not believe that two departments of this Government should be set in that position toward each other, or that when the President initiates a rate and puts it into effect the Interstate Commerce Commission should come along, without any power to set that rate aside, but simply to hear the case and to report a criticism upon the action of the President of the United States. If somebody besides the movers of this bill had proposed an amendment like that, the men who support this bill in its present form would have said, "You are reflecting upon the President of the United States, and you are giving a branch of the Government the power and the facility and the right to set up a criticism of the President of the United States."

Just one thing further. My friend from Missouri [Mr. DECKER], after complimenting the Interstate Commerce Commission in the fullest terms, when he was talking about this question of compensation, whether it was reasonable and just, said, "What are you going to say to the people about this compensation when you go back home? I am going to tell them that for 30 years we have built up the great Interstate Commerce Commission, in whom all the people have all faith and all confidence. They set these rates under which the railroad companies made these millions of dollars. I believe that they were just and reasonable." I am going to say, further, when I go back home to my people, that I have faith in this commission, that I have faith in its honesty and integrity when it set these rates, and I am going to say further to them that I voted to leave the power to set the rates in the future in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not like to take up the gentleman's time, but in the case he has stated of the President fixing the rates, the shipper takes an appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission finds it is unreasonably high, what recourse has the shipper under this bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not any. Perhaps he might go into the court at a great deal of expense, and if he won out it would cost him more than the difference in the rate. I do not say what I have said about the rate-making proposition in criticism of anybody, because my confidence and faith in the Director General and the President is as high as that of anyone.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman think that under the amendment he proposed in the committee, if it had been adopted, that it would have raised a great number of questions as to whether the President had final authority in particular instances or not?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is the same question asked before by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. It would raise a question, but not as serious as it would to this system which has grown up through a great administration to be wiped out at one fell swoop.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman does not quite get my question. Would you not have questions arising as to what were war commodities and supplies, and would you not have infinite controversy between those who contended that certain things were war supplies and others were not, and would you not have confusion worse confounded?

Mr. RAYBURN. I thought if I offered that amendment I might preserve a little of what I wanted to preserve so much, and that was the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix these rates.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DEWALT. Has the gentleman in proposing his amendment taken into consideration the powers conferred upon the President by the act of 1916?

Mr. RAYBURN. As to taking over the railroads?

Mr. DEWALT. The wording of the act of 1916—and I say this to elucidate the gentleman's argument—is that he shall take over possession and control of any system of transportation not only for the purpose of transporting the troops, war material, and equipment, but for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful and desirable.

In that connection, has the gentleman in considering his amendment taken into view what the word "control" means in law? The word "control" in law is a synonymous with management, and management is defined to mean direct control, governmental administration, or overseeing. Manage means direction, control, Government administration, and overseeing. Webster defines it as meaning to have under control and direction, to conduct, to guide, to administer, to handle. Now, the act of 1916 which stands upon the statute books gives the President the power to control, to take possession of the road. Control means to administer, and control is not confined to the transportation of troops, munitions of war, but to other things involved in the prosecution of the war. If control means to administer, I take it that under the act of 1916 he has the right to fix the rate.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not care what the act of 1916 gives the President the power to do after he takes the railroads. We are passing another law now. I would not be willing to say that under that act if we did not pass any other legislation that the President would not have the power, but I am talking about the legislation that we have before us and the amendment which I wanted to get on this legislation to make certain language mean a certain thing.

Mr. DEWALT. The gentleman's amendment would be in effect repealing the act of 1916.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am not willing to admit that. I am not saying that he does or does not have the power under that act. I am not committing myself one way or the other, but I am saying that I would like to see in this bill as far as rates are concerned the provision in my amendment.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. In connection with that, may it not be considered as worthy to be taken into account at least that when the Government took over and assumed control of the railroads it not only did so for war purposes but it necessarily had to control the railroads for other than war purposes, and that the rate-making power which existed before the taking over between the railroads and the people is now transferred to the Government and the people, and that it is proper for Congress to say on what terms that relationship shall exist and what the rates and fares shall be?

Mr. RAYBURN. That was my answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania—that we are now passing a law to govern the operation of these railroads and fixing the compensation.

Mr. Chairman, I had hoped after the vote in the committee, which stood 15 to 6 for the time limit in this bill, that the advocates of the unlimited time would cease their efforts along that line. I could not vote in committee, neither could I vote in this House, for a provision that would read like the provision in the original draft of this bill, and that was that this control should last during the war and thereafter until Congress should otherwise order. I do not believe that that provision in this bill would stand in the courts for a moment. I do not believe that under the war power we have any right whatever to take the railroads of this country for a longer period than the duration of this war and a reasonable time thereafter.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. DECKER. I would like to ask the gentleman two questions. In the first place, the President is authorized to make a contract for compensation, and, of course, in that contract for compensation the railroads will take into consideration the length and condition of the tenure. Does the gentleman mean to say that after the railroads have agreed with the President to the compensation under the terms and provisions of this bill, after they have taken the money from the Government, that they can come around afterwards and refuse to accept the conditions of the tenure?

Mr. RAYBURN. I say that an indefinite tenure in law is equivalent to ownership, and after the war is over if no time limit is set in this bill the railroads would have the right to come into court and say to the Government, "You must give me back my property or give me the value of it."

Mr. DECKER. After they have agreed to take so much for the property?

Mr. RAYBURN I deny that the President has the authority to make a contract with the railroads for compensation for a longer time than the period of the war and a reasonable time thereafter. We must not forget that the President has taken these roads under the war power and none other, and that the control ceases or should cease when the war or the emergency is over.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. If you give the President power—or, rather, try to do so—and it be ultra vires, the fact that he exercises the power which you have no right to confer upon him would not make it lawful.

Mr. DECKER. Who was acting ultra vires?

Mr. SHERLEY. Assuming the premises of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], that Congress could not confer upon the President the right to hold these roads indefinitely, then the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri is without value.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think that is quite true.

Mr. DECKER. I do not agree with the gentleman on that proposition. The only thing that he would not have the right to do, if his contention is correct, would be to compel the railroads to give it up; but as they agreed in the contract to let the Government use them under the tenure provided in the bill, I do not think, after taking the money, they could be heard to complain. But I will ask the gentleman another question. Is the gentleman one of those who believe that the Government has the right to take over the roads under the commerce clause?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do.

Mr. DECKER. Then if it has the right to take them over under the commerce clause, and we say in this bill, regardless of how they happen to have been taken over under the law of 1916 that they shall stay under the Government control until Congress shall act, would not that be bottomed on the commerce clause?

Mr. RAYBURN. It would not.

Mr. DECKER. Why not?

Mr. RAYBURN. Because the only power on this earth under which the President had the right to take these roads was under the war power expressly given.

Mr. DECKER. That is not the question I asked. The question I asked is this: Regardless of the power or under what power the President took them over, the part to which we are addressing ourselves is as to the power of the President to hold them after the war is over; and would not that right which we give him be bottomed on the commerce clause?

Mr. RAYBURN. It would not, because we have taken the railroads under the war power only——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Pardon me, but is the gentleman arguing now in respect to interstate roads only—not as to roads entirely within a State?

Mr. DECKER. Yes; interstate roads.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am arguing as to roads over which Congress has the power to legislate.

Mr SHERLEY. Laying aside the question of power, why should we, unless we favor Government ownership of railroads, provide for it, while authorizing the President to take care of a war emergency?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is what I was just coming to, and my colleague [Mr. HARDY] asked a question which suggested that. I believe he asked the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] a question like that. Why should we set a time limit and foreclose the argument on the proposition of Government ownership?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have been bothered to know upon what basis the President would fix the length of the term of the control with the railroads, if there is no provision made in this bill as to the length of time that he is to be authorized to hold them. If it is to be indefinite, is he to make an indefinite contract with the railroads? That is what would bother me.

Mr. RAYBURN. That would have bothered me a great deal, but I have trusted from the beginning in the wisdom of Congress, and in its fairness and candor to say that this is a war measure, and that at a reasonable time after this war is over this property shall be turned back to its owners. My friend from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] a while ago talked about the fact that in 1914 we passed a bill for the control of the issue of securities of railroad companies, and called attention to the fact that that bill, even though it passed the House of Representatives in 1914, had never yet been enacted into law; and he used that as an argument that we should set an indefinite time in order that we may undertake all of this remedial legislation that is necessary before the railroads are turned back to their owners. If that argument be good, that this is a slow body, that Congress is a slow organization, then I think it would be very well to have a time limit set upon this control as a spur to Congress to know that by a certain time it must do a certain piece of work.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, except to make an appeal to the membership of the House to let the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] proceed without interruption, if they are satisfied to do so, and I will give the reason.

Mr. RAYBURN. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman from Texas wants more time, I want him to have it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I certainly did not think my time lacked only six minutes of expiring.

Mr. SIMS. What I want to ask is whether the gentleman wants more time, inasmuch as so much of his time has been taken up? A situation arose this morning that none of us could prevent. When I rose last night and asked that the House meet at 11 o'clock this morning, it was with a view of having that time consumed in general debate. One hour of the time was taken up in the reading of the Farewell Address of Washington, which was entirely proper, but it got me into this trouble. I had promised a lot of gentlemen time who are not members of the committee, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] kindly consented to make his time as short as he could, but I think so distinguished a member of the committee should have opportunity to address the committee.

Mr. RAYBURN. If I am not interrupted, if the gentleman will yield me five additional minutes, I think I can finish.

Mr. SIMS. Then I yield now the five additional minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Did the gentleman from Illinois wish to ask me a question?

Mr. MASON No; let it go. I knew the gentleman was a member of the committee——

Mr. RAYBURN. Does the gentleman want to ask me a question on the matter of tenure?

Mr. MASON. No; it was in respect to another branch, but I shall let it go and ask some other Member. It was in regard to the purchase of the canal, and I had not heard any member of the committee explain that.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am not willing, Mr. Chairman, in time of war in taking over the railroads of this country as a war measure, in the hysteria created by that war condition, to saddle on this Government a great economic policy. I believe when the discussion of Government ownership comes up in this country that it should come not in a time of war or stress and dissension, when men in the passion of the hour are carried off their feet, but I believe it should come in a time when it can be stripped of every other issue, and I also believe that it is nothing but fair to us who do not believe in Government ownership of railroads and other socialistic doctrines like that that when this argument comes that we who oppose it should not be made the proponents of a bill to throw off a system of Government ownership that we did not intend to take on when we voted to give the President the power to use all the resources of this Government to try to win this war. When this proposition of Government ownership comes up I want the men who are the advocates of that doctrine to be the proponents of the bill and to come before this Congress and give the reason. There are many reasons why I would like to see this war close. There are many reasons why all of us would like to see this war close. One of the main reasons, outside of the reason that we want to stop the spilling of blood, is that I hope to see the time return when the necessity for such legislation as this, the voting away of these unheard-of powers, will cease. [Applause.]

I oppose Government ownership of railroads. I oppose an indefinite tenure. We do not know how long this war is going on. It may go on a year or two years or three years or five years. We do not know whether the great man who sits in the White House now will sit there when this war closes. We do not know whether the same Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of Railroads will be the Director of Railroads during all of this war, and I want to call your attention to the fact that I would fear to put the destiny of 1,700,000 railroad employees and $18,000,000,000 worth of property in the hands of a man who may some time occupy one of those positions and who may be over ambitious. [Applause.] A man who is overambitious, with the wages and the hours of labor of 1,700,000 employees in the hollow of his hand, a man who is overambitious with the property of hundreds of thousands of people amounting, variously estimated, to from $18,000,000,000 to $20,000,000,000 in his hands, could not only put himself in office, but he could perpetuate himself in office if he desired. [Applause.] And I hope, therefore, that we will say now that we will be candid with ourselves and candid with the country and say that we are not going into the proposition of the control of railroads of this country for any other reason except to try to marshal all the resources of this mighty Republic and try to do the one thing, and that is to win this war, and to win it as speedily as possible. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON]. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know that I can assist you gentlemen in determining these important questions that are involved in this bill. As far as my public duties will permit, I have been trying to get information upon this bill since it has been pending both on and off the floor, and I confess those efforts have been sadly disappointed. The gentleman who just took his seat said that the railroads were worth $18,000,000,000. I do not know where he got his authority for that. I have been trying to get some idea from some source——

Mr. RAYBURN. I said variously estimated.

Mr. GORDON. Estimated by whom?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, by various writers in this country.

Mr. GORDON. Yes; "the widows and orphans" talked about so much here on the floor, of course they estimate it at that. The fact is they are only capitalized at $10,000,000,000, and the best authorities in the American Congress say that 50 per cent of that is water. I do not think that anybody will seriously question that Senator JOHNSON of California, who has been governor of his State for two terms, and Senator CUMMINS, of Iowa, who has been governor of his State for two terms, know something about the railroad question. Now, what is the layman to do in reference to this bill? Unless I can get some light on it I propose to vote against it myself and wash my hands of responsibility for it. We have listened here for three days to members of the committee almost exclusively. Have they given you any information as to the value of these properties for the use of which we propose to fix the compensation at nearly a thousand million dollars a year? Has a member of the committee given any information to this House upon this subject? I have not been here all the time during the entire debate, but I have listened to them or read them, and if there has been anything adduced here to throw any light upon this question it has entirely escaped me.

Now, a gentleman who has been a Member of this House a great many years and is considered an expert upon this question discussed it here a while ago, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and he observed in the course of his remarks that the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad and the Rock Island had been mismanaged, referring, I suppose, to the looting of those great properties, the stealing, and taking and the carrying away of all of their visible assets. [Laughter.] Now, what is the use, what assistance does that give to stand up here and pat those people on the wrist in discussing such transactions as that? So far as conferring the rate-making power on the President, of course I would not vote for that. [Laughter and applause.] I think that is an impudent abandonment by Congress of all the legislation on this subject for 30 years. [Applause.] Now, this is not a partisan question, but it looks to me as though there had been a bipartisan agreement here for the withholding of any real information upon which any man could cast an intelligent vote. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman is not a member of the committee?

Mr. GORDON. Not of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; no.

Mr. MASON. Perhaps, then, the gentleman can answer this question. [Laughter and applause.] This section 6 provides, as I read it, the authority to the President to purchase canals. Do you so construe it?

Mr. GORDON. I will ask the gentleman to excuse me from construing it. I have not time to undertake to construe the provisions of this section. I am calling the attention of the Members of the House to some of my difficulties in the hope that somebody may furnish some information to assist me in forming an intelligent judgment upon this bill.

I want to say this for the aid and assistance of Members here who may feel that they want some light on the principles of the railroad question, that on the 8th of January last I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the second time a speech delivered by the late Jeremiah S. Black, of Pennsylvania, formerly Attorney General of the United States, upon the question of the legal relations of the public to the railroads, or the railroads to the public, which I commend to the consideration of every Member of the Congress and every other intelligent citizen who really desires to understand the question.

It is a great problem, of course. That speech led to the enactment of the interstate-commerce law 31 years ago. Since that time Congress has been attempting to confer power to regulate rates upon that commission. The progress has been exceedingly slow. There seems to be a mysterious influence that palsies men's minds and hands when they approach the consideration of this question. The attitude of many men seems to be to withhold such information as they really have upon the question.

Of course, the fixing of rates is a legislative function, and Congress, having other things to attend to, created this great tribunal, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and invested it with authority to hear and determine these questions. Now, just what has happened since this war started to disqualify the Interstate Commerce Commission and to qualify the President, with all his multitudinous duties as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, to perform this function, nobody has undertaken to explain. We are told by the chairman of the committee that we are at war, which is true, but what is there about that fact that equips the President to hear and determine so intricate and involved a question as that?

And then, to add to the irony of it, they insert right in the bill itself that we are asked to vote for a provision that binds the President in his determination of that question by exactly the law that binds the Interstate Commerce Commission in its consideration of it. Now, if the President is supposed to obey the law, although we are at war, how is he going to determine these questions without any investigation? Is there something about the President that enables him to determine such an involved and intricate question as that without information? Why was the Interstate Commerce Commission created and clothed with this authority? Of course, it is said and provided in the bill that if after the President has fixed this rate it should happen to injure some individual, community, or State, and they took an appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission could hear them, and then it could recommend to the President or could express the opinion to the President, that they thought he made a mistake about it. But the law carefully guards any interference by the commission in the way of correcting that mistake. I can not understand the reason for such legislation as that.

Pursuant to legislation by Congress, enacted before I became a Member of this body, the Interstate Commerce Commission is now engaged in making an appraisal of these railroad properties for the purpose of enabling it to determine their value and thus fix just and reasonable rates for the service which they render. Eleven million dollars have been expended on that work, and it is not yet completed. Heretofore, since war was declared, when we have authorized the appropriation of private property and were unable to determine the value of the property taken, or the use appropriated, we have authorized the payment to the owner of so much of the value of such property or use as could be readily agreed upon, and deferred the payment or tender of the remainder claimed until competent and reliable evidence could be secured upon which to base an intelligent judgment of the real value of such property or its use.

What is there about railroad property which renders it more sacred than other kinds of private property? Do the owners of these railroads fear that when the appraisal of these properties has been completed it will be found that their total value is much less than the stocks and bonds outstanding, upon which interest and dividends have been paid and upon which this enormous rental is in large part based? Are we being hurried into fixing this enormous rental in order to forestall any use of the appraisal now being made by the Interstate Commerce Commission and to establish the fact that Congress has wasted this eleven millions of dollars and such other sums as may be spent in completing the appraisal?

What competent evidence has been adduced to support this enormous annual payment for the use of these properties?

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think the Interstate Commerce Commission would have the temerity to suggest that the President made a mistake?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I intended to answer the argument of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who is opposed to Government ownership, but it is impossible to do so successfully in 15 minutes or even to attempt it.

I am opposed to the limitation contained in this bill upon the time for holding the railroads after the conclusion of the war. There are men who will not be moved by an earthquake. There are men who will continue to cling to the past in the midst of a world revolution, in the midst of war, in the midst of the greatest catastrophe that ever befell mankind. They are standpatters all the time, no matter what happens. They fail to realize that the entire world is undergoing the greatest change in the history of the race.

When you repudiate the idea that public utilities are ultimately to be owned and controlled and managed by the people in their collective capacity you deny the very essence of democracy.

What does private ownership of railroads mean? It means that an aggregation of capital, controlling one-seventh of the wealth of the country in a democracy, can give employment or refuse employment, can give life or refuse to the people the right to live. It means that within the limits of a country priding itself on its democratic ideals organized wealth establishes an empire of its own, a dominion of its own. And as you study the history of railroad legislation in the United States you will find that no power has exercised a more corrupting and more polluting influence than the railroads of the United States. Even such a sympathetic writer concerning America as Bryce was compelled to say, in his "American Commonwealth," that the most corrupt factor in American political life was the railroad interests. You speak of control. If you carry control to its logical conclusion, is it not a negation of private ownership? What does ownership amount to if you deny the control of the thing to the owner of it? Then it becomes a question of the measure of control, of the degree of control, of the extent of control, and instead of saying to the people that we repudiate the theory or the very possibility of national ownership of railroads to-day, you may, perhaps, say that the people are not ready to-day for national ownership; that they should be prepared for it; that a body of thought should grow up which would make it possible that the great masses of railroad workers now employed by the transportation companies should cooperate with the rest of the community; that democracy should train itself to become the owner of its public utilities and its public necessities. But to say that you are opposed to public ownership of railroads means to deny the essential principle of democracy, which means self-rule, self-rule industrially, self-rule in economic relations. What good is it if a man has the right to vote if there are within his own country powers which determine how much of his wages shall be taken away from him for bread, how much for meat, how much for sugar, how much for transportation, so that at the end of a day's work or at the end of a year's work he finds the result of his labor taken away from him by some power outside of himself?

The value of political democracy lies in the opportunity it offers to the people to evolute into an industrial democracy.

Otherwise democracy would be a mere myth. Is not self-rule the very essence of democracy? Henry Ward Beecher, in defining slavery, said: "Slavery is a state of affairs where the individual's life is controlled by powers outside of himself." When one-third of one's earnings goes to the landlord, when one-twentieth is taken by the Sugar Trust, when one-eighteenth is taken by the Bread Trust, when the railroad and the telegraph and the telephone companies take away the rest of the product of one's service, how much of freedom is left to the individual?

Private ownership of the means of transportation, of the arteries of commerce, means the establishment of a dominion within a dominion, of a nation superior to the nation, of a minority ruling and controlling the people and the functions of their agents. That is why railroads have been a corrupting influence.

When the agitation for public ownership began the railroads began to manufacture statistics. Now, it is an old story, the old joke, that "thee are liars, and liars with a strong adjective preceding it, and experts," and when experts begin to pile up statistics one loses all faith in economic science. [Laughter.]

You hear frequently that public ownership of railroads is a failure in every country of the world, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] went to the extent of saying that in the two democratic countries of England and the United States the very idea of public ownership is repudiated. For the purposes of his argument he denies that France is a democracy. Of course, France owns her railroads, so France was not democratic for the purposes of that argument.

It is impossible to compare the rates charged in the United States with the rates charged by the railroads of other countries, for the very simple reason that railroads in other countries include within the term "rate" the charge for storage, the charge for insurance, and a number of items that are not included in the word "rate" in the United States. When it comes to the question of wages in other countries——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You said that France owned her railroads. Are you certain of that fact?

Mr. LONDON. France owns the greater part of her railroads.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The statistics that were submitted to the committee, of which I am a member, showed that France owns only 20 per cent of the railroads in her territory.

Mr. LONDON. Well, France owns 20 per cent of her railroads, and Italy owns all of her railroads. This fact is true, that there has been no immigration of railroad workers from any European country to this country. That is absolutely true. Evidently the railroad worker finds that whatever wage he gets there, no matter how small it appears in dollars and cents, is satisfactory, the real value of the wage being the ability to exchange it for useful articles. Measured by that standard, by the ability to supply himself with the needs of life, it seems that the workers on railroads in the European countries are not forced to leave their countries. They have the assurance of steadiness and security of employment, which makes them prefer the work that they have.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LONDON. I am sorry I have so little time.

Mr. DENISON. Just a question.

Mr. LONDON. Unless I can get my time extended I can not yield.

Mr. DENISON. It is just one question.

Mr. LONDON. Well, what was the question?

Mr. DENISON. I was going to ask where our Irish railroad employees come in, in the light of the gentleman's statement?

Mr. LONDON. Oh, the people of a country such as Ireland are governed by considerations other than economic considerations. The gentleman ought to know enough of the history of Ireland to understand that. There are more reasons than economic reasons for that.

In addition to that, the railroad worker in Germany and in Italy and in Belgium receives unemployment insurance, old-age pensions, security against accidents, the benefit of every safety appliance to protect him, and that is a part of the wage. I want to call your attention to the statistics relating to accidents resulting in the death of passengers and railroad men, and you will find that four times as many railroad workers are killed on American railroads as are killed on the railroads of any other country in the world; four times as many. The railroad companies with their hired statisticians attempted to compare the number of railroad accidents by the amount of freight carried, and they figured out that, according to the amount of freight carried, the percentage was not so disadvantageous to the United States.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question? I want to ask a question for information?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman states that four times as many railroad workers are killed on American railroads as on the railroads of any other country. Does the gentleman take into consideration with that the number of railroads the United States has?

Mr. LONDON. I do, judging by the number of men employed.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. You mean by the percentage?

Mr. LONDON. I am not speaking of the relative proportion of mileage, but the absolute proportion of employees. Judging by the number of men employed by the American railroads as compared with the number of men employed on European railroads, the ratio is four to one. In other words, for every one employee or railroad worker killed in Europe four railroad employees are killed in the United States.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The percentage is four times as great?

Mr. LONDON. Yes; the percentage is four times as great.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Can the gentleman give us any information in regard to government-owned roads in Italy? A few days ago I read an article in a paper stating that——

Mr. LONDON. Oh, well, I have no time for the gentleman to tell about an article he read four days ago. I want direct information, not information from a casual article read four days ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I read a statement in a paper to the effect that the Government of Italy had fallen down in the management of its Government-owned railroads and had to issue bonds to get money to operate them.

Mr. LONDON. I do not know what paper that was from, or who the man responsible for the fiction in that paper was. [Laughter.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to know what the gentleman means when he says that to every 100 employed in Europe and in the United States four times as many are killed in the United States than in Europe?

Mr. LONDON. That is exactly what I mean. The figures I have are for the year 1910 or the year 1908.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman mean four times as many as compared with the number employed?

Mr. LONDON. Four times as many.

Now, when you consider the fact that the railroad companies opposed every measure calculated to improve the condition of the workers, that they opposed the enactment of the employers' liability legislation, that they opposed the most elementary provisions for safety appliances, you must realize what a tremendous danger is involved in private ownership of the public utilities, of the public arteries, of the arteries of commerce.

What is the difference between our past civilization and the present? What has made the United States possible? It is the facility of intercommunication between one section and another. Why, the arteries of commerce, the railroads, and the means of transportation are the most vital part of the organism of the country; and to permit these public utilities to be forever the private property of a group of capitalists is a destruction of the elementary basis of democracy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. May I have two minutes?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman two minutes, and hope he will not be interrupted, because I have not got the time.

Mr. LONDON. Just see this diagram which I have here of interlocking directorates. Here is a chart of the interlocking directorates held by the Chesapeake & Ohio directors in financial, transportation, and industrial companies. I will give only a partial list. In financial companies they have directorates in the American Security & Trust Co., of Washington; the American Trust & Savings Co., of Chicago; the Equitable Trust, of New York; the Farmers' Loan & Trust, of New York; the Fourth National Bank of New York; the Mercantile Safe Deposit, of New York; the Mercantile Trust & Savings, of Chicago; the Merchants' National, of Richmond, Va.; the National Bank of Commerce of New York; the National City Bank, of New York; the National Surety of New York; the Old Dominion Trust, of Richmond, Va.; the Realty Trust, of Atlanta, Ga.; the Riggs National, of Washington; the Standard Safe Deposit, of New York; the Union Trust, of Chicago; the Union Trust, of New York; and the Title Guarantee & Trust, of New York.

Then comes the list of industrial companies: Consolidated Gas of New York—there is plenty of gas in our railroad stocks—then there is the Covina Land & Water Co., the Hammond Lumber Co., the Huntington Beach Co., the Los Angeles Land Co., the Maringo Water Co., the Mercantile Burglar Alarm, the Newport Beach Co., the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., the New York Transportation Co., the Northern Westchester Lighting Co., the Old Dominion Land Co., and many others. It is a veritable octopus, a complete spider web, with the people as the flies. And this picture is not complete. It gives a diagram in connection with financial and industrial institutions. In order that it should be complete, they would have to give you the ownership of the big newspapers of the country and to what extent these interests dictate the editorials of the newspapers. And they would have to give you one more item—how many men who were formerly directors of these corporations are now adorning the bench. I do not mean that these companies send agents to the bench, but there are men there who have the psychology of the corporation lawyer.

And then, in order to make it altogether complete, it would be necessary to show how many prominent attorneys for railroad companies vote on matters of legislation in the legislatures of the country, on matters affecting the interests of the people and the interests of the railroad companies. And to be an attorney of a railroad company is the dream of every lawyer to-day. If I had the time I believe I could convince even you Republicans and Democrats that there is no salvation for a democracy except in national ownership of public utilities, and that it is our duty now to prepare for that inevitable event.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, the Bolsheviki argument to which we have just listened is so interesting that I make the point of no quorum, in order to have a greater attendance.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-eight Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise. We can vote that motion down and get tellers on the motion and get a hundred here.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's side-bar remarks are out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that the committee do now rise.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. GARNER. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DIES. I make the point of order that tellers are not in order until a division has been had.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman has a right to call for tellers without having called for a division.

Mr. DIES. I do not think so, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no doubt about it. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] asks for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. DIES and Mr. GARNER.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, what is the pending question?

The CHAIRMAN. Whether the committee shall rise or not. The tellers will take their places.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 5, noes 85.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee determines not to rise. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill H. R. 9685, finding itself without a quorum, the Chair had caused the roll to be called, when 276 Members answered to their names, and he reported a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WASON].

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of this committee for a few minutes on a subject that is of interest to myself, to my colleague from New Hampshire, and I know it is of interest to nearly every man on the floor of this House. It is likewise of interest to every citizen of this broad land. I do not wish to be understood in what I shall say as particularly finding fault or criticizing. I wish to be understood as approaching this subject in a spirit of improving the general conditions that affect the young men of the Nation who are our patriotic defenders now in cantonments, preparing for over-seas service. With that in mind and with the purpose to help rather than hinder, and improve rather than retard, camp conditions furnished, equipped, and controlled by the War Department.

Last July my attention was called to an order issued by the Secretary of War relating to the mobilization of the National Guard, so called, then a part of the Army, wherein those volunteers were to be transferred from New Hampshire and the other New England States to some point in the South for encampment and training, and the following letter expresses the views of the members of Congress from New Hampshire, to which the following reply was made:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 13, 1917.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

RESPECTED SIR: We, the undersigned, Members of Congress from New Hampshire, have just learned of the proposed action of the War Department to transfer, as soon as mobilized, the New England division of the National Guard to North Carolina or some other point farther south.

We respectfully submit for your consideration our belief that it will be for the best interests of the service if this division when mobilized is sent to a camp or camps in the New England States for the following reasons:

1. The climate of New England is more like the climate of northern France than is that of any section of the South.

2. It is more economical to the Government getting these troops to the front, viz, it will save the cost of transportation to the southern cantonment and probably more than such cost of transportation.

3. We believe that when the citizens of New England become aware of this proposed action of sending these troops South during the summer months there will be a vigorous protest against such action. We submit that public sentiment in a matter of that kind should be given serious consideration.

4. Whatever may be the conditions surrounding the places where these troops can be located in the South, we submit that for the summer and fall months, being acclimated to the New England climate, the health of the organization will be better if these troops are not transported to a new section and a very different climate.

5. This statement is based upon the supposition that the National Guard is to be sent to the front within a reasonable time, but if it is the purpose of the department to take such action later in the year or early next year, and for that reason it is considered desirable that these troops be transported to a warmer climate previous to their transfer to the front, we maintain that this action can be taken as well and better late in the fall than at this time.

We do not intend by this letter to attempt to in any way interfere with any military action which will further the prosecution of the war, but we believe that the considerations submitted are of sufficient importance to demand the very careful attention of the Department of War.

Respectfully submitted.

(Signed) EDWARD H. WASON.
SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 16, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. WASON: I have your letter of July 13, signed jointly by you and Hon. SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS. This department, of course, realizes the strength of the desire of the State to have their National Guard mobilized at home and also the importance of the consideration set forth in your letter. The subject was, however, carefully considered from every point of view, and the plan of the military situation dictated the course chosen. It is now too late to restudy the question of distribution of the guard during their course of preparation.

Cordially, yours,

(Signed) NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Hon. EDWARD H. WASON,
House of Representatives.

The New Hampshire National Guard left in August, many being transferred to Camp Greene, Charlotte, N. C., where they have been in camp since the 1st of November. Saturday, February 16, my colleague, Mr. BURROUGHS, and I spent the day at Camp Greene with brave sons of our State and with other brave sons of the other States in this Union, where they are being prepared for an early transfer for service in the battle lines of Europe. On arriving at the camp grounds we were met at the end of the street car line by our friends, who furnished us with two pairs of good rubber boots, which we soon found were absolutely necessary for our protection and comfort, and wore them until we left camp that night. It was mud, mud, mud everywhere. We found the soldiers quartered on a tract of land consisting of 6,000 acres, on a beautiful elevation, pleasantly located, and a reasonable distance from the city of Charlotte, N. C. The camp was adequately provided with electric lights, supplied with good water from an extension of the water system used by the citizens of Charlotte. Two lines of street cars extend from the city to the camp, one adjacent on the south side of the camp, the other on the north side. The land is reasonably level, good elevation. On the east is plenty of shade and adjacent to the woods is a small, pretty lake. The soil is a reddish clay. The men expressed satisfaction in regard to their food, and inspection of kitchens and supplies confirmed their statement. Having heard some criticism of the sanitary conditions at the camp, we paid close attention to that, for the purpose of discovering what the real facts were.

I had naturally supposed that the War Department, after the selection of this site had been made, would provide means for properly equipping the camp, as it should do in every case, having particularly in mind the health and comfort of those who are sent there for training. I had expected to find suitable highways that were passable for trucking, suitable streets for the companies, suitable barracks, adequate and suitable system of sewage and drainage, suitable provision for heat, and quarters for bathing purposes. We were informed that the wet, muddy condition about the camp was less than it had been two weeks previously. I saw automobiles helpless in the mud in some of the main roadways; I saw teams of four mules on these same roadways, with a light load, where the wheels left ruts from 12 to 18 inches deep. The Government has done nothing toward road making and done nothing toward fixing company streets. Not a rod of sewage system has been installed by the Government or anybody else. Water stands on the surface of the ground where the ground is level, and where it is rolling runs into pools or, in some instances, down to a very small brook which extends through a part of the grounds. Discarded latrines exist in large numbers, unprotected, filled to the surface of the ground, with filth waiting for the hot rays of sun to fester and produce germs of malignant and dangerous diseases. These latrines are in close proximity to the tents occupied by the soldiers. Very soon, when the climate becomes warmer, this camp must be very insanitary.

Our Government has no moral right to expose our soldiers to such dangers. The soldiers' barracks are all tents and should not house over five men. There were seven, eight, and nine men in a tent, and these tents had been without board floors prior to about the 10th of February, or a week or 10 days prior to our visit.

Mr. FORDNEY. In the tents?

Mr. WASON. Yes; there were no floors in the tents. One company of 250 men had been furnished with 18 rifles, another company with 256 men had 21 rifles, making a total of 39 rifles for two companies of 506 men. Not one of those rifles fit for a man to discharge with accuracy.

Mr. LITTLE. When was that?

Mr. WASON. Last Saturday, February 16. My colleague will furnish additional details of conditions at this camp.

Mr. Chairman, it is almost unbelievable for me to realize that the War Department would transport men past camps well equipped to a camp like Camp Greene without equipment. The War Department should never mass thirty or forty thousand soldiers in a cantonment or camp without a suitable sewage system and suitably constructed roadways for truckage to and from the camp. One of the first things the War Department should provide for is healthful conditions. Observing the conditions there, I am frank to say that I can not excuse and feel that the man or men who have neglected this site since it was selected last summer are blameless of culpable neglect and wanton disregard in failing to install a suitable system of sewage at this camp before its occupancy by our young men transferred there for training from all parts of the country.

The War Department should immediately construct a suitable system of sewerage and drainage, and I am glad to say that the Surgeon General within a few days has inspected this camp and made the following observations and recommendations, and it is reported that immediate action is being taken on the points raised in his report:

FEBRUARY 12, 1918.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War:

The wet weather and character of the soil at Camp Greene, Charlotte, N. C., together with the temporary nature of the camp, have brought about conditions which I wish to call to your attention and which may be summarized as follows from the last two reports of sanitary inspections of the camp:

GARBAGE REMOVAL STOPPED BY MUD.

Knee-deep mud has interfered with garbage removal by contractors, and quantities have been dumped or buried because of shortage of fuel for burning it.

Limited facilities for heating water for bathing over a period of several months has resulted in the men becoming dirty.

Water from the kitchens, baths, and overflowed latrines is removed by ditches, surface drainage, or stands in pools. The character of the soil will make it slow to dry out, and with the advent of warm weather flies and other insanitary conditions may be anticipated.

The dirt floors of the kitchens will breed flies. The field ranges in use are uneconomical and smoke indoors with any wood fuel.

Shortage of supplies has held back the work on the detention camp for contacts until its overcrowded condition has led to the establishment of quarantine areas in the regiments, but reports upon this indicate that completion of the detention camp is preferable to continuation of the latter plan, especially since sufficient tent space and separate latrines and mess halls have not been available to make the regimental quarantine absolute in the areas set aside.

Work has been held up on the additional quarters for nurses by failure of material to arrive, and the same has affected progress on reconstruction of the operating and laboratory buildings of the base hospital, which were recently destroyed by fire.

Overcrowding, to the extent of eight men to a tent, and occasionally more, is reported.

SICK RATES NOT NOTABLY HIGH.

Sick rates at Camp Greene are not notably high, and measles and pneumonia cases appeared on the decline at the last report, but the insanitary conditions mentioned should be corrected without delay to prevent increased sickness and mortality, which may result from their continuance.

It has been recommended that additional tentage be supplied the commanding general, Camp Greene, to enable him to quarter all men on the basis of five to a tent instead of eight. It is understood that this recommendation has been approved.

The immediate necessity, Camp Greene, is the installation of a sewer system for the entire camp, which is again urgently recommended.

W. C. GORGAS,
Surgeon General United States Army.

Seven or eight months has passed since the selection of this site, and I am wondering what immediate action means. My inquiry is: When is it going to be done? My answer must be: It should be attended to now without delay. The War Department can not act too quickly in this matter. The country can not urge too strongly the department to attend to that drainage and sewerage forthwith. It should have been attended to before a single boy from any State had been sent there.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman mean drainage or sewerage?

Mr. WASON. Both drainage and sewerage and suitable highways or roadways.

Under these conditions that I have briefly outlined I was impressed as I talked with the soldiers of the indisposition to find fault or complain. They were in good spirits, eager, and enthusiastic to actively engage in the great work before them; they were restive for actual, active service; their morale was excellent, and I wondered what influence had kept them so enthusiastic and happy under conditions there. It is an old saying that man is influenced by his surroundings, and from these men I learned that the most cordial relations and friendship existed between the camp and the citizens of Charlotte. The clubs, the Young Men's Christian Association, and kindred activities extended a cordial welcome to them. Entertainments on a large scale were often provided for these boys. Everything was done to make their camp life pleasant and cheerful. In fact it would almost seem that the home life of that city was influential in maintaining the spirit, the buoyancy, and the morale of each and every soldier there stationed.

As we left this camp and as I have reflected upon the conditions of my friends and constituents and the friends and constituents of other Members of Congress there it has caused me to have feelings of sadness and pain to realize that all the money so willingly provided for the establishment, equipment, and maintenance of these training camps in this land that somewhere in the machinery of the War Department some person or persons have failed to perform their official duty in reference to equipment at this location. I hope that this is the only instance of neglect of this kind with reference to cantonments selected by the Government.

Mr. Chairman, as our Army, either at home or on foreign soil, with calm courage and patriotic impulses, discharges the great task that we are engaged in, as our beloved warriors their names are to be enrolled on the pages of history with reverence and honor for their sacrifices, sufferings, and efforts to extend those beloved principles of liberty and justice, let us hope and believe that they and the soldiers of England and France may be successful in the great and far-reaching task; let us stand loyally behind them and give them every encouragement and help that we can to fortify them stronger, if possible, as they fight for us and for those principles; let us remember what the story of the service flag in the window at home means which J. E. Evans, of Washington, D. C., has so fittingly expressed in rhyme:

THE SERVICE FLAG.

Say, Pa! What is a service flag?
I see them everywhere.
There's little stars sewed on them;
What are they doing there?
Sometimes there's lots of little stars,
And sometimes just a few.
Poor Widow Jones has only one—
I saw her crying, too.

My darling boy, those little stars,
Upon a field of white,
Are emblems of our glorious boys
Enrolling for the right.
The border, as you see, is red,
Which represents their blood;
The stars are blue, the heavenly hue;
The white is always good.
Each star you see means some brave boy
Has left his hearth and home
And gone to fight for Freedom's cause
Wherever he may roam.
So when you see a lot of stars
Lift up your heart with joy,
And when you see a single one
Pray for some mother's boy.
They go away, those gallant lads,
Across the wreck-strewn sea;
They go to pledge their country's faith
For God and liberty.
The Stars and Stripes they bear aloft
To join the British flag,
And, with the colors of brave France,
They mean to end "Der Tag."
And soon, my boy, that service flag,
Born in the Nation's heart,
Will show the world that, when unfurled,
We proudly take our part.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I must beg the indulgence of the House while I say a few words about Camp Greene, which happens to be located in my district and in the midst of as brave, loyal, and hospitable people as can be found on earth. The camp consists of 3,000 acres of land, leased and paid for by the citizens of that county and given to the Government free of charge for five years. Sixty-five acres of that territory are covered by a hospital. Since this cantonment was located there two double-track electric street railways have been built to the camp, 2 miles distant from Charlotte. It is the only camp in the South that I know anything about where the street-car fare is only 5 cents, with universal transfers in the city. Water mains were laid to and throughout this camp at no expense to the Government of the United States, furnishing the finest filtered water. The Government did not pay a cent for carrying the water to the camp and into the camp, and the water is now furnished to the Government for the camp at 7 cents per 1,000 gallons. In my home town we pay 25 cents, I believe, as a basis for the first 1,000 gallons. The Government gets it for 7 cents.

An electric light and power plant was built at no expense to the Government, leading to and into the camp, and the electric light and power are being sold to the Government and the soldiers at 1½ cents per kilowatt hour. I believe the people in Washington pay 10 cents per kilowatt hour, and I think they pay more than that in all of the camps and cities and in Charlotte. I know that it is the cheapest rate that any cantonment has in the South, unless it is at Greenville, S. C., which, I believe, has the same rate. The authorities in Charlotte township have appropriated $90,000 to build two magnificent concrete highways—not roads, but magnificent streets of concrete—from the city of Charlotte to the camp.

They have had from the beginning a macadam road to the camp which has never been impassable, which can not be said of a number of other roads leading to camps throughout the country. I am glad my friend from New Hampshire mentioned the cordial spirit that existed between the people of Charlotte and the soldiers. I do not think a community can be pointed out in America where a finer feeling and spirit exists between the soldiers and the citizens. Last Christmas $5,000 were raised by voluntary donation for a Christmas tree, so that every boy in the camp of 35,000 soldiers received a Christmas present from that donation and every child in Camp Greene received a present from the children of Charlotte and each present was marked, "From the children of Charlotte to the children of Camp Greene." Another thing, the best homes in that great city have been thrown open from the first day the soldiers arrived in that camp to the soldiers, and especially the privates. In fact, on Sundays and holidays it is estimated that 3,000 boys are taken into the best homes in that city and given the best food that those citizens can procure for them. [Applause.] And the same is true of every holiday——

Mr. SHERWOOD. What is the population?

Mr. WEBB. Forty-two thousand. Now, there was great congestion, of course, in the city of Charlotte, like there is now in the city of Washington, because the soldiers' families and friends were coming, and the good homes of Charlotte did that which they never before had done—that is, threw open their splendid homes to the officers and their families at absolutely reasonable rates. A number of well-equipped clubs have been established in the city for the officers and privates, and just now one of the prettiest pieces of property in the city of Charlotte has been donated and completed and equipped for a private soldiers' club. Whenever an officer or private wants a bath or resting place, he can find it to his heart's content in that hospitable town, and the boys use them just the same as the citizens of the town use them. All the churches and all the church receptions of that city are thrown open every Sunday and Sunday night and prayer meeting nights, and at all other times when the churches are open the boys can enter them and are invited to enter them ad libitum, without even a card.

I am pleased to tell you that the boys take advantage of it, and I do not know of a similar camp in this country where a larger proportion of the boys in camp attend the churches and religious exercises than they do there. For about three months a division of northwestern soldiers—as strong, healthy, and magnificent body of men as I ever saw march in parade—were located at Camp Greene, and the affection existing between the people and those soldiers was simply delightful to behold, and since they have left and gone to France the mails and newspapers have been filled with veritable love letters from the soldiers, and they wanted to name their splendid division the "Charlotte" division out of pure affection for the people on account of their kindly treatment of them. It can not be said that there is a camp in the United States with a finer health record than Camp Greene. The reports of Surg. Gen. Gorgas show that, and to-day or last Monday a week ago there were only 17 men in that camp who had the disease peculiar to camp life and which all good men are trying hard to fight.

I do not know of a place anywhere where the morals as well as the health of the soldiers are more carefully and painstakingly guarded than they are in Camp Greene. The fact is Secretary of War Baker some time ago made a speech in Washington to the Fosdick Commission and pointed to the feeling and spirit existing between Charlotte and its boys as most ideal and commended it to other camps as one that they might well emulate. This camp, as you may or may not know, like many other camps, was established as a cantonment, as a resting place not necessarily to be made a permanent institution, and therefore the Government has not yet built these sewerage systems and concrete streets, and I believe the camps at Spartanburg and Greenville and other southern camps, Camp Gordon, possibly, where they have not put in concrete streets, would come under the same condemnation as my friend from Massachusetts has leveled against this camp, as to mud and lack of sewerage.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. ROGERS. This is absolutely for information. I have heard it stated that when the location was still under consideration of a camp at Charlotte, N. C., the city agreed to build roads provided the camp was located there, and that the roads which the city had agreed to build had not, in fact, been built. Can the gentleman inform us upon that point?

Mr. WEBB. When the camp was located there, it was located on a fine macadam public highway between Charlotte and the city of Gastonia, and that road has been used up to this time. But now the local authorities are ready to build two great concrete roads between Charlotte and the camp, at a cost of $90,000. I never before heard that the city had failed to carry out any agreement about roads, and do not think it so. The complaint about mud, gentlemen, can be leveled against any camp in the South. I do not know how it is in the North, but we have had the most severe weather in our country that we have had in 37 years. And where you have only earth roads 10 or 15 feet wide through a camp, you can expect, with the heavy Army trucks running over them, that they will be cut up and become muddy at times of heavy rains or snows. If the Government will put in roads and streets and sidewalks of concrete inside the camp and put in a sewerage system, Camp Greene will be the banner camp of that entire section of the United States.

And I am happy to say that the War Department has informed me that they have now had drawn up by the engineers a system of sewerage in that great camp; they are already putting in sewerage in the hospital, which, as I have said, occupies 65 acres of ground. We all hope that sewerage and streets will be put in this camp soon. And when that is done I assure this House you will not only have the best camp in the United States, where the feeling between the citizens and the soldiers is as fine as anywhere in the world, but you will have as beautiful and healthful a camp as any on the face of the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, according to my reckoning I have an hour and 10 minutes remaining. I would like to use the hour from now on, and I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the debate closes at 6 o'clock.

Mr. SIMS. I want to say that the gentleman is entitled to use all the rest of the time, whatever it is.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, I have no apology to make for taking 10 minutes of the time of this committee.

Mr. DIES rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WASON. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS] did not yield to the gentleman from Texas. Can he take him off the floor by making the point of no quorum?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire will have his time. The point of no quorum has been made. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and two gentlemen are present, a quorum. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS] will proceed.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, I make no apology for taking 10 minutes of the time of the committee to call attention to some matters relating to Camp Greene, near Charlotte, N. C., the condition of which has already been adverted to by my colleague, Mr. WASON.

It is easier for me and much pleasanter to praise than to blame. I realize how easy it is to criticize those in positions of heavy responsibility. It is always easier to find fault than to take hold and do the job yourself. But I feel very strongly that it is due to the Members of the House that I should now state as accurately and precisely as I am able what my colleague and I actually saw at the camp at Charlotte on the occasion of our visit there on Saturday, February 16, 1918.

Camp Greene is located about 3 miles from the city of Charlotte, N. C., on somewhat rolling ground of slight elevation and having a surface soil of clay formation. This soil is almost completely impervious to water, and the effect of melting snow and recent rains there has been to make it a veritable bog. Mud is knee-deep in all the roads throughout the camp. As my colleague has stated, we had to wear rubber boots in order to get around at all. Water is standing in large pools and ponds all over the surface of the camp. No carriage or automobile could possibly get into the camp, much less make its way through it. I was informed by an officer that a few days before he had seen three mules so badly stuck in the mud that they had broken their legs trying to get out and had to be shot.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has just spoken of the many things done by the city and people of Charlotte for this camp. I want to say in reply that what I am stating is not intended in the slightest degree to be any criticism of the city of Charlotte or of the good people who live there. I have no doubt all the gentleman stated concerning Charlotte and its inhabitants is perfectly true. What I say by way of criticism of conditions at Camp Greene goes to those who were directly and immediately responsible for locating and maintaining the camp there. I say that the great War Department of this Government is greviously at fault for its failure to provide adequate and proper sewerage facilities in a camp where upward of 40,000 young men, the pick and pride of this country, are quartered to-day. That is what I find fault with. That is what I criticize.

There is not now and there has never been since the camp was established last summer any sewerage system whatever at Camp Greene. Dirty water from the kitchens and refuse of all kinds are thrown into ditches, and a good part of it remains there, because it can not get away and the clay soil will not absorb it. We were told that the garbage and refuse had been burned as long as they had sufficient wood for this purpose, but that for some time the supply of fuel had been short and that for this reason, as well as on account of the knee-deep mud in the roads, which had prevented garbage removal by the contractors, there had seemed to be no other method of disposition of the refuse, garbage, and kitchen water than the method adopted. We saw a number of old discarded latrines. They are still open and exposed and are filled with 6 or 8 feet of decaying, putrid, festering animal matter. When the warm weather comes, as it is likely to come any time in this southern climate, it takes no sanitary engineer or expert to predict what is going to happen. Flies are going to breed there in enormous quantities, and typhoid fever and diphtheria are likely to break out at any time.

Now, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] tells us that the War Department is talking about putting in a sewerage system. That is all right, but it ought to have been done months ago. It ought to have been done, as it was done, at the northern cantonments, before the men were taken there at all. This work can not be done in a day, or a week, or a month. It is going to take a considerable length of time to install any kind of sewerage system at this camp. Meantime the warm weather will be on us, and everyone of those 40,000 men quartered in that camp will be in imminent peril of his life. I say it is up to the War Department to do something, and to do it now. If they can not install a proper sewerage system before the warm weather comes—and I am frank to say I do not see how this possibly can be done—I see nothing else to do than to remove these boys to some other camp. Certainly they must not be left there under conditions such as I have described.

What I am stating is of direct interest to pretty nearly every Member of this House, because, as I understand it, there are men at this camp from practically every State in this Union. I personally saw and talked with men from my own State, New Hampshire, from Maine, Vermont, and Massachusetts, as well as from Louisiana and many Central and Western States. They all told the same story. They are not complaining. I never saw a finer spirit amongst any body of men in all my life than I saw amongst all the men who are now living in the mud and water at Camp Greene. In this body of men there are, as I am informed, between 400 and 500 New Hampshire boys. They form the nucleus around which has been organized and built up what is now known as the First Headquarters Guard Regiment, consisting of approximately 3,300 men. They are as fine a body of men as were ever organized for military purposes. I was told by one of the officers of this regiment that about 80 per cent of them were either college graduates or came into the service from some college.

This New Hampshire regiment is located in what is obviously the most undesirable and dangerous site in the whole camp. They are on low land in close proximity to the ditches and latrines, which I have already referred to. No regiment ever ought to have been placed there, and there was no necessity for locating them there. I was informed that before the New Hampshire regiment was placed on this site other regiments protested against being located there and had been placed elsewhere. Certainly the New Hampshire regiment should be moved from this location without any delay. Neither they nor any other body of men ought to be compelled to live under such conditions another day, and I propose to immediately call the attention of this matter to the Secretary of War and ask for their removal.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] spoke about this camp being intended to be a temporary camp. That may be so, but what of it? I do not care whether it was intended to be temporary or permanent, I know that what I am telling you is an accurate statement of what I saw there last Saturday, and I was reliably informed by officers and men that the conditions for weeks before had been much worse than they were the day my colleague and I were there. Temporary or not, the camp has been there since last summer and bids fair to continue for some considerable time to come, and the fact is that, according to the statements of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], the War Department is just now beginning to talk about putting in some sort of a sewer system. Suppose it was intended to be temporary, what provision, if any, did they make for disposing of their garbage and sewage? I answer, none whatever at all adequate to the conditions which they knew existed there. They knew it was not a sandy soil that would easily absorb water. On the contrary, they knew that it was a clay soil on which water would stand for days and weeks. I say that under such circumstances it was inexcusable to provide no sanitary system for disposing of this dirty water and refuse. It was certainly incumbent upon the War Department before they took those boys away from their homes and brought them to this southern camp to provide all reasonably adequate means for protecting them after they arrived there.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURROUGHS. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to say that a month ago the father of a young man, a constituent of mine, went down there, and he told me that after he had visited the camp he had to go to a hotel and stay five hours while he had his overcoat and trousers cleaned.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I have no doubt of it, and I should probably have had the same experience if I had not worn rubber boots, which the officers had kindly provided me. As I have already stated, I was told again and again that conditions were much worse there three or four weeks ago than the day I was there.

Mr. GILLETT. If the gentleman will allow me, when was that camp established?

Mr. BURROUGHS. Some time in the summer; I can not tell exactly when. I know that the New Hampshire boys have been there since November.

Now, let me tell you another thing. We were told, not only once, but several times, that until a few days before we were there these boys in the New Hampshire regiment had been sleeping on their cots, without any wooden flooring in their tents. In other words, until within a few days before we went down there they were sleeping on their cots, which stood in mud 3 to 6 inches deep. More than that, we were also told that no bathing facilities whatever had been furnished them by the Government since they came to this camp last November. I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a report of the Surgeon General of the United States, which report will verify what I am saying.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUFKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURROUGHS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LUFKIN. Are any shower baths installed there?

Mr. BURROUGHS. Absolutely no shower baths, as I am informed. Certainly the New Hampshire boys had none, and I understand there are no facilities for shower baths, or, in fact, any kind of a bath, furnished by the Government. I understood that the Maine regiment had rigged up some sort of arrangement for themselves, where they had four little pipes that they could go under and get something like a shower bath. Others may have adopted similar expedients; I do not know about that. What I mean to say is that, at least so far as the New Hampshire regiment is concerned, the Government of the United States has furnished them no bathing facilities whatever since they came to Camp Greene last November.

Mr. LUFKIN. If a man wants to get a bath, what does he do?

Mr. BURROUGHS. He goes either to the Young Men's Christian Association building at Charlotte, 3 miles away, or to some private house in the city. I want to say that my information is all to the effect that the townspeople generally have been most cordial and kind to these boys.

Mr. GANDY. Where do they get the drinking water for that camp?

Mr. BURROUGHS. Drinking water is obtained from the city of Charlotte. I understand there is no criticism whatever in regard to the drinking water or in regard to the food. So far as I can I want to praise conditions at the camp. The drinking water is all right and the food is all right. The men have plenty of it, and it seems to be good.

I found that the New Hampshire boys had not sufficient equipment. They seemed to have had sufficient clothing, including uniforms, shirts, shoes, overcoats, and other wearing apparel, but they were short in the so-called ordnance equipment, by which I mean rifles, belts, packs, pack carriers, and so forth. This regiment is organized for headquarters guard duties, and there might be some excuse for not equipping it with machine guns and other implements of modern trench warfare.

There can, however, be no excuse for not furnishing them with full equipment of rifles and the other ordnance equipment referred to. This has not been done. The men of this regiment have substantially no rifles. The captain of one company, when I asked him how many rifles he had, replied: "I have four men now doing guard duty. Each of those has a rifle, and there in the rear of the tent you see all the rest we have." I looked where he pointed and counted the rifles, and there were just 14. Another captain told me he had 35 rifles for 242 men. I was informed that one battalion, consisting of about 1,000 men, had just 115 rifles. These rifles which the men have are not the modern rifles used at the front but are the old discarded and condemned Springfield rifles. They may be all right for the manual but can not be used at all for range practice. As I understand, they are not available for rifle practice. Gen. Pershing has recommended that before these men go to France they shall be instructed in range firing, and it is an utter impossibility for them to have this practice with the rifles they now have. Right here, let me say, that I feel considerable anxiety for the company commanders of this regiment, and, in fact, all regiments not suitably equipped. My understanding is that present Army regulations place entire responsibility for the training of the men upon the company commander. Also, I understand that when called to account for the lack of training of their men, it is no answer or excuse for the commander to say that he has not been supplied with adequate equipment. Especially is this likely to be the fact in view of the impression given by the Secretary of War that there are rifles enough. Whatever may be the condition with other regiments at Camp Greene, with respect to rifles, and whatever may be the condition at other camps in this regard, I state here and now, upon my own responsibility, that the men who compose the First Headquarters Regiment at Camp Greene have no adequate supply of rifles. I further state that the officers of this regiment made requisition months ago for rifles and other ordnance equipment and were informed that such equipment was already on the way and would soon be received. This was in December last. Shortly thereafter some equipment was received, but when the officials came to check it up with what they had requisitioned they found that instead the rifles, belts, packs, pack carriers, and other supplies and equipment they needed, and which had been asked for, all that had been actually sent them were mess pans and currycombs. [Laughter and applause.]

We also learned that men constituting the First Headquarters Guard Regiment at Camp Greene had had no opportunity for drill since sometime in December. I can not see how it would be possible for any man to drill under such conditions as I saw them at the camp last Saturday. Personally I had to have assistance in order to walk over the roads and paths of the camp, in order to maintain my footing in the mud and water.

Another matter that was forcibly brought to our attention on this visit was the overcrowding in the tents. The men all live in canvas tents about 16 feet square. Gen. Gorgas, the Surgeon General of the Army, has from the beginning repeatedly, and with great emphasis, urged and recommended in his official reports to the War Department that not more than five men be quartered in a tent. This would give them 50 square feet of floor space to each man, which he says is essential for the health and well-being of the men. Instead of that we found eight, and in one instance I counted nine cots in a single tent. My information was that this is the general condition throughout the camp, and I find this is confirmed by the official report made by the Surgeon General to the War Department on February 12.

I am glad to be able to state that in spite of the insanitary conditions referred to the sick rate at this camp has not been unusual. The hospitals are not overcrowded at the present time. We were informed, however, that there was a lack of medical supplies at the regimental hospital of the First Headquarters Guard Regiment. I did not, however, understand that this had been a matter of long continuance.

The only method of heating the tent is through the small field ranges, which are conical-shaped stoves about 2 feet high, and standing on a base about a foot in diameter. In these the men have been obliged to burn green wood which they have had to cut themselves, and my information is that there is a shortage even of this fuel at the present time. These ranges, as the Surgeon General states, are uneconomical and smoke indoors with any sort of wood fuel.

The great thing that I complain about at Camp Greene is the insanitary condition throughout the camp, due, in large measure, to the utter lack of any system for the disposal of sewage. This, I say, is without excuse. It is shameful. It is a disgrace to this great Government. Here are more than 40,000 men, the pick and flower of the young manhood of this country, ready to lay down their lives, if necessary, in defense of their country. All they ask is, if they have to lay down their lives, they may be allowed to do it on the field of battle under their country's flag and fronting their country's foes. [Applause.] They do not want and the Government of the United States has no right to ask the boys to die ignominiously like rats in a mud pen. I can not too strongly emphasize my conviction that the conditions at Camp Greene, as my colleague and I saw them last Saturday, call loudly for instant and radical remedy. Whatever may be necessary or advisable elsewhere, there should be no further "watchful waiting" at Camp Greene.

In further substantiation of the statements I have made I present the official report of W. C. Gorgas, Surgeon General, United States Army, to the Secretary of War, dated February 12, 1918, four days before our visit to this camp. This report is taken from the Official Bulletin of February 14, 1918, and reads as follows:

REPORT OF GEN. GORGAS.

FEBRUARY 12, 1918.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War.

The wet weather and character of the soil at Camp Greene, Charlotte, N. C., together with the temporary nature of the camp, have brought about conditions which I wish to call to your attention and which may be summarized as follows from the last two reports of sanitary inspections of the camp:

GARBAGE REMOVAL STOPPED BY MUD.

Knee-deep mud has interfered with garbage removal by contractors, and quantities have been dumped or buried because of shortage of fuel for burning it.

Limited facilities for heating water for bathing over a period of several months has resulted in the men becoming dirty.

Water from the kitchens, baths, and overflowed latrines is removed by ditches, surface drainage, or stands in pools. The character of the soil will make it slow to dry out and, with the advent of warm weather, flies and other insanitary conditions may be anticipated.

The dirt floors of the kitchens will breed flies; the field ranges in use are uneconomical and smoke indoors with any wood fuel.

Shortage of supplies has held back the work on the detention camp for contacts until its overcrowded condition has led to the establishment of quarantine areas in the regiments; but reports upon this indicate that completion of the detention camp is preferable to continuation of the latter plan, especially since sufficient tent space and separate latrines and mess halls have not been available to make the regimental quarantine absolute in the areas set aside.

Work has been held up on the additional quarters for nurses by failure of material to arrive, and the same has affected progress on reconstruction of the operating and laboratory buildings of the base hospital, which were recently destroyed by fire.

Overcrowding to the extent of eight men to a tent, and occasionally more, is reported.

SICK RATES NOT NOTABLY HIGH.

Sick rates at Camp Greene are not notably high, and measles and pneumonia cases appeared on the decline at the last report; but the unsanitary conditions mentioned should be corrected without delay to prevent increased sickness and mortality which may result from their continuance.

It has been recommended that additional tentage be supplied the commanding general, Camp Greene, to enable him to quarter all men on the basis of five to a tent instead of eight. It is understood that this recommendation has been approved.

The immediate necessity, Camp Greene, is the installation of a sewer system for the entire camp, which is again urgently recommended.

W. C. GORGAS,
Surgeon General, United States Army.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty Members present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that the demand for a division is dilatory. The Chairman had announced the result.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman is within his rights. The question is, Shall the committee rise? A division is demanded.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move in all good faith that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the very proposition on which the committee is dividing.

The committee divided; and there were 56 ayes and 5 noes.

So the committee determined to rise.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9685) for the operation of transportation systems under Federal control, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. DIES. I object.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

Mr. SIMS. I thought so myself when I made it.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 23, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 23, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Earle Wilfley, pastor of Vermont Avenue Christian Church, Washington, D. C., delivered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful God, our Heavenly Father, whose we are and whom we serve, we would begin each day's duties rightly, and therefore do we plead for Thy divine guidance upon the session of this day. We pray, Heavenly Father, that into our minds may be put the truth that makes men free, into our hearts the human kindness that makes men loving, and the justice that is over all. We pray, Heavenly Father, that as we go on the journey we may have the guidance of Thine eye, the strength of Thine Almighty arm. Bless this distressed globe; especially bless our own beloved land. Put wisdom into the hearts and minds of those in power in the halls of legislation, in the marts of trade, and in the great thought of the people. We pray, Almighty God, that each man in his own way and in his own time may deal justly with his fellow man, so that to-day, Heavenly Father, we do pray that justice and right may prevail; that from the session of this day good may follow; from the minds of these men, Thy servants, the leaders of our people, may go that which will strengthen us in the eyes of the world, and win Thy approval. Bless all that may be dear to us as individuals and as representatives of a great free people, and in our relation to our brother man, in our relation to the nations of the world, may there be such exact and even justice, such cordial and sympathetic friendship, as that in the ages to come generations unborn may look back and say, The deeds of those great days were well done. God hear us, answer us in Thy wisdom, and to Thine own Divine end we ask, for Thy name's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the privileges of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, in the RECORD of February 19, 1918, under permission granted to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS] on February 6, appears an extension of remarks, a part of which are the remarks made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS] upon the alien-slacker bill, so called. The greater part of the extension consists in——

Mr. LANGLEY rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. LANGLEY. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that my colleague, Mr. POWERS, is not here this morning. I do not know whether he will be here to-day or not, but I suggest to the gentleman that it would seem better, and especially in view of the fact that there is no need of action on this matter immediately, that he wait until Mr. POWERS can have an opportunity to be present, so that he may say whatever he desires to say in answer to the comments of the gentleman from Massachusetts or of anyone else who may discuss the proposition the gentleman is raising.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, if the colleague of the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. POWERS, can give me any information as to when he thinks he will be here, I will be glad to have him do so.

Mr. LANGLEY. I can not. I have not seen my colleague from Kentucky to-day. I do not suppose he knows that this matter is to be brought up. I am acting entirely on my own initiative and on what seems to me to be the proper course. I feel it my duty to make the suggestion I have, and that is as far as I can go.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to seem to be taking advantage of the gentleman from Kentucky in any way, and at the suggestion of his colleague I desire to say that I am willing to forego raising this question at this time, but I wish to give notice that I shall bring it up on Monday or Tuesday of next week.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3752. An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a letter from J. J. Saunders, parole clerk of the Arizona prison, in regard to the enlistment of convicts in the Army.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter touching the enlisting of convicts in the Army. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the railway-control bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the railway bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the same request.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a request to cover all—that all gentlemen who have spoken on this bill or who may speak on it may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks.

Mr. GARNER. On the bill?

Mr. SIMS. Of course.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on this bill or who may speak on it shall have five legislative days from the time the bill is disposed of in the House within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMS. On the bill.

The SPEAKER. On the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, unless the request is made so as to comprehend only gentlemen's own remarks and pertinent citations, excluding telegrams, letters, and editorials, I shall object.

Mr. SIMS. I think that is proper, and I adopt that suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee modifies his request so as to exclude letters, telegrams, editorials, and extraneous matter generally, that the speeches printed shall be on the bill, to be the gentlemen's own remarks or such citations and quotations as are absolutely pertinent. Is there objection? There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. LEHLBACH was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Michael Friel (H. R. 16666, 63d Cong., 2d sess.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. POLK, for to-day, February 23, and Monday and Tuesday, the 25th and 26th, on account of important business;

To Mr. HAMLIN, for three days, on account of illness; and

To Mr. OLIVER (at the request of Mr. SMALL), for two days, on account of important official business.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9685) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes. Pending that, how much time does the gentleman from Wisconsin lack of having consumed his entire time?

Mr. ESCH. I think 35 or 37 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Thirty-seven minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Then I ask unanimous consent that general debate shall continue for 37 minutes more, the entire time to be used by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the railroad bill and, pending that, asks unanimous consent that general debate be extended for 37 minutes, and that the whole of that time may be used by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire if the gentleman from Wisconsin intends to discuss this bill?

Mr. ESCH. As far as I know those to whom I will concede time will speak on the bill; yes.

Mr. WINGO. I have no objection to the extension of time for general debate if the discussion is confined to the bill, but I do not care to be held here to hear political speeches such as we heard on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. And with the assurance it will be confined to the bill——

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not give any assurance about what anybody is going to say at any time or place or about anything.

Mr. WINGO. I am not asking the Chair, if the Chair will permit, but I am asking the gentleman from Wisconsin for that assurance.

Mr. ESCH. As far as I am assured by the three or four gentlemen to whom I will yield time, they are to speak on the bill.

Mr. WINGO. With that assurance I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9685, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9685, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9685) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES]. [Applause.]

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, of course no man can adequately discuss this great proposition in the time allotted to me, so I shall only undertake to deal with one or two of the things which I think are important in the consideration of this bill. Having taken the step that has been taken, the Government having already taken over the management and operation of a large percentage of the railroads of the United States, it would be futile for me to discuss the wisdom of that step.

Indeed, if the question now under consideration was whether or not the Government of the United States should at once relinquish the control of these carriers I doubt if I should care to assume the responsibility of taking the affirmative of the question, fearing that such a step would produce confusion worse confounded than we now have. While I desire in every way to support the Government in the prosecution of the war, it seems to me proper to discuss what shall happen after the war necessity for this operation by the Government has passed. In other words, how long after the close of the present war is it desirable for the Government of the United States to retain control and continue the operation of the railroads of the United States?

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] discussed very fully the other day the subject of Government ownership in other countries of the world as well as in this. I had intended to supplement what he said by other facts that could be cited to show the disastrous results of Government ownership where it has been tried, but my limited time forbids. I will, however, say that I have made a comparison of the operation of the privately owned railroads of the United States and the Government-owned railroads of Germany and Japan for the year 1913, the last year before the war. Although the railroads of Germany were then conceded to be the best example of Government ownership and operation in the world, and although Japan paid its railroad employees the lowest wages paid for similar service in the world, the comparison is all to the advantage of the roads of the United States. I have put the results of this comparison in the following table. The figures, which are taken from official documents, speak for themselves:

The reason for the failure of Government ownership is not far to seek. The reason exists entirely in the nature of the ordinary human being. Few men are dominated, though some I hope are, by altruistic motives. The ordinary man is dominated by selfishness, and if he is employed in an occupation that does not conduce directly to his benefit or to his comfort or to his wealth, he is very little interested in the occupation. As soon as Government ownership comes in this element of self-interest is largely eliminated. The employee has then to work not for himself primarily, but for the benefit of all the people of the country in which he lives. The result is a great falling down in efficiency, in energy, and in capacity. As a result of this recognized human characteristic I think any dispassionate man who will examine the history of the world since Government ownership has been tried will come to the conclusion that the privately owned railroad corporation can pay the taxes that are imposed by the Government, can pay interest on investment of private capital, can pay higher wages to labor, and at the same time can furnish to the people of the country served better and cheaper service than Government-owned railroads can furnish when relieved from all taxation and all responsibility for interest on the investment. It seems to me that anybody who will look at it deeply and dispassionately, and who is not hypnotized by some alluring theory, must come to this conclusion.

I am quite well aware that a fine case can be made out for Government ownership in theory, but facts are stubborn things, and a few facts of experience will answer all the theoretical arguments in the world. All that is necessary for an ordinary man to do to be thoroughly satisfied of the results of Government ownership of railroads is to go to Europe and travel upon the Western Road of France, for example, which is the only road in France owned by the Government, and then upon the other roads of France, which are owned privately. Cross the line and travel on the railroad lines of Prussia, for example, which before the war were concededly the best managed and operated Government roads in the world, and then go to England and travel on the privately owned roads of England.

Just let him keep his eyes open and his mind in an open attitude so as to take in and pass upon the facts that will come to his attention and he will come to the conclusion that private operation is vastly superior in every way to operation by the Government.

You do not need to go so far away as France or Prussia or England or any other foreign country to get this object lesson. All you need do is to do as I did a few weeks ago, take a trip from Pittsburgh to Washington on the great Pennsylvania Railroad and see the transformation that has taken place in the conditions of the service even since last December as the result very largely of the operation of this line by the Government. To be sure, some of this disorganization and inefficiency may be laid to the jar that has come about by changing the status not only of the Pennsylvania Railroad but of many of the great roads of the United States east of the Mississippi River. Any man who is connected with large business affairs or who knows much about business would know that this great change could not be made without a great shock coming not only to the property and the business directly affected, but to all the business and industries of the country that are at all depending upon it. So I do not claim that all that I saw of inefficiency and disorganization is to be laid to the fact that the Government was operating this road.

But this is what happened: I rode on one of the limited trains. In the first place, the train did not start for three-quarters of an hour after it should have started, apparently not being in a hurry to get away. When it got under way we were several hours late into Harrisburg. We should have made the trip from Harrisburg to Washington in three and one-half hours. As a matter of fact it took us nine hours to make the trip. All the way we had no heat in the train, though the temperature was down to about zero. We landed in Washington at 2 o'clock in the morning, instead of the day before. On the way we had plenty of opportunity to observe the condition of things on the main line. I saw many hundreds of carloads of coal standing on the sidetracks, and this was at the time we had the coal famine in Washington and generally throughout the country. These hundreds and hundreds of cars standing on the sidetracks had a foot of snow, at least, on them, indicating that they had been there for some time. I saw many cars marked "Out of order," standing on the sidetracks, some loaded and some empty, but more of them empty, and on examination it was apparent that the needed repairs were not serious in most cases. Many of them only needed a bolt put in a drawbar in order to make them serviceable, but no bolt had been put in. Everything you looked at and every part of the service with which you came in contact caused you to become conscious that inefficiency and disorganization were rampant everywhere.

The manager, superintendents, foremen, and others charged with the responsibility for the operation of this great system are in a state of perturbation and uncertainty. They do not know where they stand and fear that at any time they may be superseded or removed. As a result the heart and energy are taken out of them. The same is true of the subordinates under them. They are uncertain of their positions and, besides, they feel—many of them—that they are working for Uncle Sam, and it makes little difference whether they lose time, get the freight through, or how they perform their duties—Uncle Sam is rich, and their wages will be coming through on pay day just the same. There is only an impersonal interest in their occupation, and the spur of self-interest is very largely removed. They expect that politics or political considerations are to take the place of the demand that has constantly come from their superiors for their efficiency and good work. Their hope for promotion according to the rules and length of faithful service and the usages and practices established by those charged under private ownership with the responsibility for these things has been disturbed and, in their mind, probably destroyed.

As a result of all this there is no discipline among the employees. The employees of the Pennsylvania system, heretofore courteous, obliging, and accommodating, were quite the reverse upon the occasion of my last trip. And I understand from those who have taken trips similarly that the same conditions can be found upon other railroads that are now operated by the Government of the United States.

And the same conditions, showing the same results, exist in the shipbuilding industry. I happen to be connected with the iron business in a small way, and so am somewhat informed in regard to the various lines of the iron and the steel industry. And I am advised from reliable sources that last June and July, before the United States took hold of shipbuilding actively, 350 rivets per day per man was an ordinary average day's work, but that now, or when I got my advices a week or 10 days ago, this had decreased until 180 to 130 rivets per man per day was the average day's work.

On the 22d of February Herbert Hoover, the National Food Administrator, gave a statement to the public asserting that, owing to the fact that the freight transportation of the railroads was so inefficient and demoralized, there was danger of a food shortage in all the districts of the East for the next two months. The whole blame is put by Mr. Hoover on the railroad congestion, which has continued for three months, two of which have been under the control and management of the National Director General of Railroads.

Mr. C. R. Wilson, our Federal food administrator for the District of Columbia, puts the situation locally in the following words:

Many weeks ago, when it became apparent that a more stringent program of wheat conservation would probably have to be adopted, I made an informal survey of the supplies of wheat, rye, barley, oats, etc. then in the hands of the bakers and wholesalers of the District, inquiring of them what they had on hand, what they had rolling to Washington, and what they had ordered I was then principally concerned with getting into our markets an abundant supply of the substitutes for wheat, and to this end I furnished to some of them—all who showed a desire to cooperate—lists of mills throughout the country at which the substitutes could be had

Our bakers and merchants generally gave loyal support, but because of bad weather, freight congestion, and embargoes they could not get their orders accepted, or, if accepted, could not get shipments through. Later special arrangements were made with the proper railroad officials for expediting carloads of foodstuffs upon notice to them of delayed transportation.

A notice was at once sent out from my office to every possible consignee of foodstuffs in Washington that if he would report delayed shipments to my office, giving car initials and numbers, nature of shipment, names of shipper and consignee, and route over which shipped, every effort would be made to have the shipment expedited.

From that day to this a clerk in my office has done little else than sit at the telephone and receive complaints from consignees and forward them at once over the telephone to the proper designated railroad officials, giving complete information covering delayed shipments and refusals by railroads to accept shipment on account of embargoes.

We have splendid cooperation from our merchants and from the railroad officials with whom we have been in touch, but there have been delays of weeks, even months, in transportation from points both far and near. There are many instances of delays of weeks even from points in Virginia and Maryland.

Now, what is the cause of all this? It is the same cause exactly as produces inefficiency and lack of energy in every industry that the Government undertakes. It is the same trait in human nature operating that makes it impossible for any socialistic effort or experiment to be a success. It is because the man who feels as though he was to draw his wages or that he would eat or that he would have his desires satisfied just the same, whether he took any interest in his work or not, or whether he worked half his capacity or his full capacity; such a man will not work with the same energy and the same interest or the same efficiency that he would use if he understood that he must produce something in order that his employer may be able to pay him his wages and that some one knows what he is doing who has power to raise his wages, to promote or discharge, according to his real deserts. [Applause.]

It seems apparent to me that the sooner the exigencies of the war will permit the Government to relinquish control of the railroads of the country, the better it will be, not only for the railroads and their owners but for all the people of the United States. I can see no reason for continuing this Government control and operation for any considerable length of time after the close of the war. If the Director General spends any of the public moneys for betterments or rolling stock or for dividends or for anything else that he is authorized by law, that he can not recover for the Treasury out of the operation of the lines, he will certainly have taken bonds or other securities—or if not securities, at least the notes of the company to whose benefit the expenditures will inure. Therefore, when the time comes for the relinquishment of his control, the whole matter will be a matter only of accounting. Thirty or sixty days will be ample time in which to adjust the financial relations of the Government to the railroads. I can see no necessity for any extended legislation, but if such necessity should exist, or if it should be apparent before the formal declaration of peace that some legislation would be necessary, Congress will still be on the job, and by a joint resolution could extend the time until such time as legislation to meet the situation could be formulated and passed.

Under the conditions existing in the country, as I have briefly outlined them and as I think they are known to nearly all the people of the country, is it not for the interest of the people of the United States that these roads should not remain under this governmental control longer than necessary?

And what interest have the roads in continuing this operation? It is to be expected that the hundreds of thousands of owners of the bonds and stocks of the railroads of the country will be perfectly satisfied to shoulder all their responsibilities upon the Federal Government during the uncertain and strenuous times of the war if the Government guarantees, as it does in this bill, to return the various properties in as good repair as they are at present, to keep up the supply of motive power and rolling stock, and to pay the dividends that the roads have been able to earn during the last three years.

I am finding no fault with these provisions of the bill. Having taken their property away from them, I do not see how we could do much less and be just; but if the railroads are to be returned to their owners, is there any advantage to them which the legislator should consider in having the present relation continue beyond the war?

The study of the subject has convinced me that there is not, and I have supplemented my opinion by the opinion of some of the best railroad operators in the land. One of the men connected with the management and operation of the great Chicago & North Western Railway system, in answer to my request for his opinion in this matter, writes me as follows:

I know of no reason whatever why the railroads should be held a moment after the war ceased, and there will be no better time for the Government to drop control than immediately with the close of the war; and the railroads, as well as other peoples, can readjust themselves at the same time.

I also quote a few words from page 179 of the hearings before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, where Julius Kruttschnitt, formerly of the National Railway Board and chairman of the board of directors of the Southern Pacific Co., makes the following statement:

I think the bill should prescribe definitely when the roads are to be returned to their owners. If the conditions during the time that the Government operates the roads are thoroughly met by the officers of the Government, such as providing revenue to the railroads to pay increases in wages, to meet large increases in expenses—increases in expenses larger than those that prevailed at the time that the Government took the roads over—I don't see any reason why the roads should not be returned to the owners substantially at the time of the declaration of peace.

If the Government advanced money by taking securities to roads that wanted to make betterments in the way of second tracks or terminals, I assume the Government would receive some kind of security for these loans or advances; and I can't conceive why it would be necessary to wait six months or a year or two years after the declaration of peace simply because these advances had been made. I really don't see—I can't conceive of conditions that would require holding these roads indefinitely, as the bill seems to provide, after the close of the war. It seems to me that they should be returned to the owners within a reasonable time put in the bill, "not exceeding blank months," I should say—six months.

Both of these men are among the brightest railroad operators of the country, men who have come up from the ranks and know the railroad business from the bottom to the top, by experience, and their opinion in this matter is entitled to great weight.

There are two reasons why justice to the railroads requires that we release to them their property at the earliest possible moment. The first has been alluded to by the above gentlemen I have quoted, and is briefly this: At the close of the war all kinds of business in the country must pass through a more or less extended stage of readjustment to new conditions. The railroads of the country should be put into the hands of their owners so that they may pass through this adjustment with the other business interests of the country. This adjustment must take some time, even if there were no change to be made from the Government to private operation; but this adjustment must include an organization on a different basis and in many respects on very different lines than were required under Government operation.

The second reason is that already many of the employees of the railroads while in private hands have been discharged, others, no doubt, will be by the Director General, and the longer the railroads stay in Government hands the more of these employees will be discharged, and the more the organization of the railroads will be disorganized and disrupted.

The railroad tracks, locomotives, cars, buildings, and real estate are not the only valuable possessions of the railroads. Almost as valuable are the skilled, trained, and organized forces of employees that make up the operating organizations of the various lines. At the best that can be done the railroads are going to suffer a great loss as a result of the partial disruption of these organizations, and, as I have said, the longer the Government operation continues the greater will this loss be.

For the above reasons I hope that when the time comes to amend the bill which we have before us the House will adopt the view of the minority report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and will reduce the time when the Government may maintain its control of these great properties from two years to one, or, preferably, to six months, after the close of the present conflict.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, as I have only 10 minutes, I desire not to be interrupted.

Mr. Chairman, the pending bill attempts to provide for the control and operation of the railroad systems of this country by the President for a period not exceeding two years after the close of the present war and to fix a compensation to be paid to the owners of these railroad systems—to fix rates and wages, and to appropriate the sum of $500,000,000 to inaugurate such operation.

At the present time these railroad systems have been taken over and are under the control of the President by virtue of the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916, which says:

The President, in time of war, is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation, or any part thereof, and to utilize the same to the exclusion, as far as may be necessary, of all other traffic thereon, for the transfer or transportation of troops, war material, and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable.

It will be noted that the bill under consideration is not limited to the control of the railroads, but extends to the operation of the same. While it is not directly a bill for Government ownership of these roads, if enacted into law this legislation will necessarily give in the conduct of these great lines of transportation conflicting authority, uncertainty, and confusion, and must result in the demoralization of business and of the railroad service.

The Hearst newspapers, which assume to speak for the administration, claim that the enactment of this bill into law will assure Government ownership of public utilities, and Thursday in the Senate Senator LEWIS, spokesman of the administration, said:

Mr. President, I may shock those who may know me with some intimacy when I wish it understood that I view this bill as the beginning of the Government ownership of the railroads. More than that, sir, from my viewpoint this bill initiates the policy of this Government into the ownership not only of the railroads but into that era of the ownership of the telegraph and the telephone in America, to be followed by the ownership or the control of the agencies of fuel, those natural agencies—coal and oil.

I shall not discuss the question of Government ownership of railroads. Last Tuesday in this House the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] made a notable speech against Government ownership of railroads. He brought to that discussion a wealth of information and research that was very valuable to the Congress. By an array of the highest authorities he showed conclusively that wherever public ownership of railroads has been tried the world over it has inevitably resulted in complete failure and a return to private ownership.

This speech appears in the RECORD of yesterday and should be read by everyone who thoughtlessly favors Government ownership. It ought to settle forever the question in the minds of those who impartially examine the subject, and I am pleased to know that despite the hysterical declamations of a few in both Houses of the Congress who favor Government ownership and who denounce imaginary plutocrats that the Congress will not commit the country at this time to the Government ownership of railroads.

When the war is over the question of Government ownership will have been settled forever, for I am sure that the future operation of the railroads by the Government during the war will result in such a failure to better our conditions that we shall be only too glad to return these roads to the rightful owners.

The history of railroad progress in this country reads like a romance. In the dark days of '61 the loyal Government under Lincoln conducted a mighty war and at the same time built a great railroad across the continent. This was followed by the extension of railroad lines over the United States, by the granting of public lands by Federal systems, by the help of States, by the relief from taxation, by the assistance of counties and even townships, until our railroad system has grown to be the wonder of the world. It is the largest and richest system of any nation, while its rates and fares are much less than those of any other country in the world.

In the building up of these great railroad systems it necessarily followed that many promoters made themselves rich, and successful attempts were here and there made to wreck a railroad for the benefit of certain promoters.

But during the last 10 years much has been accomplished to place the railroad systems of the United States upon a sound financial basis, to prevent dishonesty in the conduct of the roads, and to place the supervision of the State and Nation over all these branches. This has been done by the establishment of the Interstate Commerce Commission, whose duty it is to regulate the fares, charges, and conduct of interstate roads. Also, many States have through their legislatures established public-utilities commissions, having authority in connection with the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate the charges and supervise the conduct of their railroads until to-day it is almost impossible, under these laws and regulations, for a railroad company to water its stock, to issue stock and bonds, to establish unjust tolls and charges, or dispose of its franchises and property or to encumber the same without the consent of these Federal and State commissions, and it is no argument against the private ownership and operation of railroads that in the past there have been dishonest men in control of these lines of transportation. The great railroad heads to-day are men of ability and honor; their efficiency and fitness are vouched for by the President of the United States in his address to Congress January 4 last when he said:

It was in the true spirit of America, and it was right, that we should first try to effect the necessary unification under the voluntary action of those who were in charge of the great railway properties; and we did try it. The directors of the railways responded to the need promptly and generously. The group of railway executives who were charged with the task of actual coordination and general direction performed their difficult duties with patriotic zeal and marked ability, as was to have been expected, and did, I believe, everything it was possible for them to do in the circumstances. If I have taken the task out of their hands, it has not been because of any dereliction or failure on their part but only because there were some things which the Government can do and private management can not. We shall continue to value most highly the advice and assistance of these gentlemen, and I am sure we shall not find them withholding it.

But it is said by the advocates of Government ownership that at the present time we are in a great world war; that there has come a crisis in this Nation in its transportation facilities, and that it has become necessary for the President to appoint his son-in-law as Director General of the railroad systems for the purpose of making more efficient these lines of transportation for the purpose of the war.

It is true that the great railway systems of this country have been placed in a position where they were unable to fully perform the most efficient work. While the expense of operating railroads has increased to an alarming extent the Interstate Commerce Commission during the last three years has persistently refused to raise the rates of these transportation companies. This commission has not had the courage to do justice to the railroads. The expenses of these railroads have more than doubled. They have been obliged to husband every resource to move their trains. Strikes have forced them to raise the pay of their employees, while freight rates have remained practically the same. Of necessity they have been obliged to abandon many crippled freight cars because they have been unable from their returns to give the needed repairs, and during the past year there has been thereby a loss to these roads of 57,000 freight cars.

The Detroit Free Press of January 18 last expressed this thought in an article, in which it said:

While production of coal in the United States, notwithstanding the shortage of men, has been increased, due to the use of mining machines and other labor-saving devices, there is considerably more coal consumed than formerly, due to the increased consumption of munition plants and manufacturing establishments, the increased use of coal on ships, and at the training camps. In this connection there is naturally more coal being burned, due to the severity of the winter.

At many mines there is a shortage of railroad cars, due to the fact that the railroads have not sufficient equipment to handle the enormous volume of business now thrust upon them. The policy of the Government has been one of strangulation toward the railroads for many years. Railroad credit has been destroyed and bonds and stocks could not be sold in order to purchase more equipment.

Yet, in spite of all these handicaps and unjust treatment of the railroads by the Government, we find that during last year these great railroad systems increased their traffic by 135,000,000,000 tons. This is not a failure of transportation, as has been charged, but a wonderful success.

It was not necessary that the President should take charge of the operation of these railroad systems at the present time or ask for the enactment of this bill. Had the Interstate Commerce Commission given the necessary assistance by an increase in rates those who use the railroads would pay the charges and this extra income would keep up this rolling stock and make the roads efficient.

The President under his war powers, which he has now by law, could have directed the transfer and preference of any freight necessary for the conduct of the war. As it is now contemplated by this legislation, the President shall go further and not only raise the rates on these lines, which he has already done, but raise the wages of railroad employees. This bill will place in the hands of the President $500,000,000 to be spent as he directs, which money must be paid by taxes on all the people, even on those who do not use the railroads.

The Detroit Free Press, above mentioned, in the same article from which I have quoted, further says:

During the summer of 1917 newspapers throughout the country came out with flaring headlines advising people not to buy coal, stating that the price would be less later in the year. These statements were exceedingly misleading, and instead of the dealers throughout the country buying coal and beginning to store July 1, as has usually been the custom they procrastinated and did not begin to lay in their winter's supply until the middle of October.

In other words, the purchasing of winter fuel was postponed until at least three months and a half after the ordinary time when dealers begin to lay in stock.

Thus we find that it was not the fault of the railroads that during this present winter traffic has been congested and coal could not be more promptly delivered to distant sections of the country from the mines.

The individual had been soothed by the Government into a delusion that the Food and Fuel Commissions would lower to him the price of coal if he would only wait and be patient, and he waited. The coal dealer had been convinced by the Government that if he stored coal it would be commandeered and taken from him, and he could see nothing in the business, and thereby did not order from the mines. So a situation had been forced upon the people which was not the fault of the railroads and has not been remedied by "workless" and "heatless" days.

This bill will doubtless pass, giving to the President and his son-in-law supreme authority over these great lines of transportation. To my mind this means endless trouble and disaster to the business of the country. The Washington Times, the home organ of the administration, one of the Hearst progeny, says that there is to be a reorganization under McAdoo of the directors, managers, and officials of all these lines. Men who have spent their lives in this work and have come up from the section man and brakeman to president and general manager will find themselves displaced by place hunters, politicians, and officeholders, who know nothing about railroading and who care less, satisfied and contented to occupy an office and draw fat salaries from the Government while the people make large appropriations to take care of the deficits that are sure to come.

The late issue of the Railway Age says editorially:

"LEST WE FORGET."

Almost exactly 12 years ago one of the wisest and farthest-seeing Americans that ever lived made a prediction. The prophet was James J. Hill. The prophecy was that continuance of the policy of railroad regulation then being adopted by the State and National Governments would bring national disaster.

The policy was continued. The prophecy has been fulfilled. The disaster has come. It has come in the midst of the Nation's participation in the greatest of all wars. The Government last week ordered the industries of the busiest and most populous part of the United States shut down for five days. It has made each Monday in the same territory an enforced holiday for 10 weeks.

Those responsible for the order say it was necessary because the railways could not haul all the coal that the mines could produce and other industries could consume—that this was the only way to relieve the transportation congestion and increase the movement of fuel.

This is but a partial explanation. Last summer the Government created a Fuel Administration and put at its head a college professor, who knows little about fuel and less about administration. The great need of the country as regards fuel was a vast increase in production. No possible amount of conservation would make the supply sufficient. To get the needed increase of production the prompt adoption of large constructive measures was essential. Prices must be so fixed as to encourage the operation of mines which under ordinary conditions would be unprofitable. Production must be raised and kept to the very maximum possible during the summer and fall months when transportation conditions were favorable. It was desirable to divide the country into zones, as was long ago done in England, so that coal would be consumed near where it was produced and cross hauling and waste of transportation be eliminated.

The large constructive measures needed were not adopted. Instead of cooperating with the railways as was necessary, the Fuel Administration spent its energies in "passing the buck" to them. With a Fuel Administration which knew anything about the fuel business, there would have been a larger amount of coal produced and transported.

The rest of the explanation of the existing situation is that James J. Hill's prediction has been fulfilled. For 12 years the State and National Governments have followed a policy of regulation intended to compel unrestricted competition between railroads and to reduce their net return to the lowest basis which the courts would not hold confiscatory. In consequence, while the productive capacity of our industries has been rapidly increasing, the expansion of the facilites of our railways has been rapidly decreasing. The final outcome was clear to every intelligent and sane railroad man or business man. It was as certain that under this policy the railways in time would become unable to handle all the country's commerce as that the law of gravitation would continue to operate or the sun to rise in the morning and set in the evening.

This Nation is now passing through its supreme crisis. The voice of the political demagogue appeals to the elements of unrest and the logic of the mob. The wild socialism that has destroyed unhappy Russia attempts here in America to clothe in darkness the lighthouse of the Constitution and by the false fires of Government ownership to lure on the rocks and the breakers of socialism the ship of state that these wreckers may share in the plunder and spoils.

In this hour of destiny the Congress of the United States should stand like a mountain wall against the delegation of unlimited power to any one man. We should also have the political courage to defy the unthinking and frenzied mob, so that at the end of this terrible war we shall return again to our old-time prosperity and to "a Government of laws and not of men."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDOW]. [Applause.]

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, every phase of the subject matter under consideration has been so completely and exhaustively discussed by Members who have preceded me that I deem it unnecessary to attempt, in the few moments I have at my disposal, to discuss this bill except in a general way. Mr. Chairman and fellow colleagues, this world is passing through a period of change, mutations follow in rapid succession. Things are happening to-day with a suddenness and passing on with such velocity many of the people of this Nation can only stand and wonder what is coming next; we have altered our relations and changed our attitude to the nations of the world, and we have undertaken to reverse every process of thought and action, every rule, established by business, capital, and labor under which our national life has developed into the rich and mighty among the nations of the world, and we are attempting to change the natural law of supply and demand and to regulate and control the habits of human beings by acts of legislation.

I have infinite faith in the patriotism of the American people, and as their Representative in Congress I intend to support any legislation necessary, no matter how radical in character, to assist in winning this war, and will in the future, as in the past, support many measures and grant unlimited and unheard of powers to our President to enable him to act unhampered at all times in its prosecution to a successful end. It should be superfluous for me to state that 90 per cent of the legislation I have voted for during this Congress would not have had my support under normal conditions.

The importance and gravity of this legislation are second only in importance to our declaration of war and our selective-conscription act. In it we assume the property rights of the railroads, estimated at $18,000,000,000. We also assume the liability of compensating the owners for the use of their property, which amounts to about $1,000,000,000 a year, if we compare an average of their earnings for the past three years, as contemplated by this bill. We also assume the responsibility for the personal welfare of almost 2,000,000 railroad employees and their families.

Mr. Chairman, when the President assumed control and took possession of the railroads he was taking private property, and this Congress and Nation is ready to pay for the use thereof; the question that remains is one of fair and just remuneration and what means or method can be best devised to secure this result.

The President took possession of the railway systems of the country under the act of August 29, 1916. This act limits his possession to the duration of the war, when, unless we otherwise provide, the control of these systems will automatically be restored to their owners. Legislation now being enacted should, in my judgment, confine itself to this emergency, therefore that section of the bill designed to extend Government control to 12 months after the war should, in my judgment, be adopted, for it is in harmony with the general purpose of the bill.

Another feature of this bill, to which I will briefly refer, relates to rates of transportation. We have the right or authority to give to the President or any other individual or official the power to initiate rates. I should hesitate before voting to place such a power in other than the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, where it has rested for years, but for the fact that the railway systems are now under a new management and will be for the period of the war, and I intend to hold the President responsible for the operations of our railroads, the personal welfare of our 2,000,000 railroad employees and their families, and the $500,000,000 we have appropriated in this bill. I expect the President to use his own judgment in the matter of new equipment, in increasing the wages of the railroad employees, and in perfecting the railroad system to such a degree of efficiency that congestion of freight, such as we have had in the past six months, and a repetition of fuelless days for our factories and homes and fuelless ships loaded with supplies for our Army and our allies will be impossible; and holding the President personally responsible for the successful operation of and for all the expense incurred by the railroads, I am not going to grant to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right and the power to initiate rates for securing the money to pay for expenditures that they have not incurred. The President being responsible for the management of the railway systems is entitled to devise ways and means of obtaining revenue for their maintenance. I believe, however, that Congress should insist that the Interstate Commerce Commission continue to perform all of its former functions—except those to initiate rates—and particularly to continue to perform those with reference to the many safety-appliance acts so necessary to the safety of life and limb of the railroad employee and the general public.

Mr. Chairman, at the time the President took possession of the railroads it was apparent to everyone who was at all familiar with the real condition of affairs that the military operations of the Government were being seriously hampered. Troops, supplies, and munitions of all kinds were being delayed both in transit and upon their arrival at the place of destination. It was also apparent that the congestion of freight of all kinds was increasing day by day and some radical step was necessary if we were going to have an efficient dependable system of transportation.

I have heard much comment relative to the congestion of our great railroad systems, and I believe this breakdown should not and can not be credited to any single circumstance or any individual fault of any individual railroad or their system. Many things must be taken into consideration when seeking for the cause of this unfortunate event. In the first place, we have the unprecedented business activities of this war confined almost entirely to one section of this country. In fact, the New England States, the State of New York, and the State of Pennsylvania have seen many of their towns grow into cities within the period of a few weeks. This vast increase in transportation, made necessary by virtue of the largely expanded munition manufactories, steel plants, shipyards, garment manufactories, and so forth, and the added burden of carrying fuel, feed, and the other necessities of life to the many new inhabitants in that section has been a handicap which the railroads were struggling to overcome two years ago, and it was natural, I suppose, to place over 80 per cent of our war contracts with the large manufacturers of our Eastern States and quite natural for those manufacturers to increase the size of their plant in their old location rather than seek new sites in some other section of the country, but I believe time and money would have been saved if a larger percentage of our war contracts were given to the manufacturers of the Middle West or if the manufacturers in the eastern section of our country had utilized the manufacturing establishments in the Middle West, thereby spreading our war activities and permitting the machinists, the molders, and the men of the building trades to remain in their old homes, working in their old factories, thereby saving expense, time, and material necessary for the building of new homes and new factories; and last, but not least, segregating for transportation our millions of tons of finished war products to the seaports. It is a question in my mind if the railroads, although under Government control and a cooperative system of operation, will be able to handle efficiently the millions of tons of raw material and finished product that will have to be transported to and away from the New England section of the country. It may be more advantageous, even at this late day, to utilize the manufacturing establishments in the Middle West than to erect thousands of new homes in the New England States, and if my suggestion is acted upon I believe we will find it to be a permanent remedy for the freight congestion of that section of the country. No human being can do more than estimate the increased tonnage of all commodities to and from New England during the past year, but the increase in fuel alone that the railroads transported was 2,817,000 tons, and this coal was used in furnaces that were working night and day turning out munitions of all kinds. The experience of my people in the city of Buffalo and the county of Erie with fuel, or, rather, the lack of fuel, during the past few months has led me to try and suggest something that will prevent a repetition of those fuelless workdays. Another cause that assisted this congestion was the deplorable lack of sufficient storage or freight-house facilities at our manufacturing points, our ports, or any place between the points of departure and the destination of our immense tonnage of freight.

The men of this Congress can not realize what two and one-half million tons of freight for our allies and our own Army laying in the open upon the commons and docks of the city of New York represent in cost of human life to the cause of the allies. I hope the powers granted in section 6 of this act will be immediately taken advantage of. Our Barge Canal in the State of New York can and should be utilized at once. Thousands of tons of coal, wheat, lumber, steel, and so forth, can be transported upon its waters.

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to represent a constituency of over 200,000 people; one-fifth, or about 40,000 of them, are employed by or identified with the railroads of this country, and I think the most important part in securing efficiency for the railroads is to have a contented body of satisfied employees; and I believe this is the proper time and place for me to brand as a malicious falsehood the story that is being circulated that the railroad employees are assisting in every way possible toward a complete breakdown of our railroad system. I know that the cost of living has advanced so rapidly during the past few years that it has been impossible for many of the really efficient and capable men—some of whom have large families to provide for—to remain in the service of the railroads; and I have talked with hundreds of railroad men from my district, and they are going to remain in the employ of the railroads as long as they can eke out an existence for themselves and their families if it will help to win the war. Mr. Chairman, I am personally acquainted with hundreds of men who are receiving less than $3 a day, when they could double their income by seeking employment in some factory; and they are really depriving themselves and their families of the real necessities of life so as to be able to assist their Government in a position in which they are most competent to fill, and the Government should at the earliest possible moment grant a substantial increase in wages to all of the men employed in any department of the railroad. I hope the committee appointed by the Director General that has that subject matter under consideration will be able to make a report in the very near future, and that report should grant an immediate, just, and substantial increase in wage for the railroad employees. Mr. Chairman, under normal conditions I doubt if I would be in favor of the radical legislation contemplated in this bill, but I believe the Members of Congress are personally responsible for the welfare of our boys across the sea, and I am ready to go to the very extreme in securing a positive line of communication for the transportation of munitions and supplies of all kinds to them. And I believe the time has arrived for the Government, through action of Congress, to assume the responsibility for the personal welfare of the families of the 2,000,000 employees of the railroads. And to coordinate operation and unify under Government control the great railroad systems, at least during the period of the war, is the only solution that will solve our present problems.

In conclusion, gentlemen of the Congress, allow me to call to your attention this fact: In our urgent deficiency bill we appropriated $3,000,000 for the transportation of soldiers. We will be able to save considerable bookkeeping and would be rendering an act of justice to our soldier boys if they were permitted to use the railroads gratis when upon Government business or when enjoying a furlough to their homes. I hope Mr. McAdoo will give this suggestion his serious consideration. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York yields back the remainder of his time. The gentleman has permission to extend his remarks under the general order.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to use the remainder of his time?

Mr. ESCH. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, were I in favor of a deliberate and carefully planned movement to curtail efficiency and retard the efforts for a satisfactory rearrangement of the transportation systems of the country, I would vote to place in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission the sole power to regulate railroad rates, so long as those roads are under the supervision of the Government. If I desired to place upon the people, by direct taxation, the burden of paying for any deficit which may and which probably will accrue, not because of the management of the roads under Government control, but because of the condition surrounding them which affects and disturbs not only the business world but the entire population of the country, I would be willing to vote for delay and argument. I would be satisfied to await the result of that difference of opinion as between the active management of the roads and the only body which would thus have the power to say whether or not the shippers or the people must make good the deficiency. If I desired to belittle our Executive and to tie his hands at a moment when, perhaps, rapidity of action and quick perception might save not only time but embarrassment, I would vote for the proposition of dividing responsibility, though I agree that divided responsibility is an almost sure antidote for efficiency.

However, I believe that in times such as these the President of the United States must be sustained, and I have heretofore shown this belief in my votes on this floor. Further, I believe that the President, as the directing power of the railroads, stands as the president of every line which has been taken over and therefore his orders are to be obeyed and his policies in relation to transportation and rates carried out as if that order came from a railroad president in the course of the operation of his individual line, with power over every factor and policy.

I have no quarrel with the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has done a great work; it has proved equal to all emergencies in normal times. These times are not normal. We can not afford to procrastinate or to wait for argument in cases which will not admit of delay. We can not afford to saddle any tax upon the people which is not necessary, nor can we refuse to give them the alternative of not patronizing the men or class of men who will ultimately seek to take from the people the added cost of transportation should the railroad rates be raised.

There is no question that should the Interstate Commerce Commission be clothed with the power of rate fixing in this emergency, it would resolve itself into a judicial tribunal to adjust differences and gather information, while the President would be compelled to await that action in the face of a situation urgent and imperative. During this interim the shipper would be favored and that favor would necessarily, without alternative, be paid for from the pockets of the people.

We have now conferred upon the President the power to raise wages, to increase the facilities and the upkeep of the roads; given him the responsibility of guaranteeing the roads a vast income, such as they have been making in the prior war years, and shall we now seek to take from him the only possibility he has to carry out these guaranties, except the possibility and probability of handling and operating the roads on a more efficient basis, thereby increasing their earnings sufficiently to make it unnecessary to raise the rates? Being the representative of the people, the President will have no incentive to do anything save to operate the roads in the interest of all the people, his sole thought being to so manage them as to bring about a successful conclusion of the war at the earliest possible moment.

Some time ago my judgment and experience showed me that the manufacturing interests and businesses of the country were outstripping and going ahead of our railroad facilities. I thought I could see the situation approaching us which has finally developed. A few weeks ago on this floor I made the statement that the railroads had fallen down. I further stated that the Garfield order was a fatal error. I believe to-day almost everyone agrees with this statement, and it is well known by shippers the country over that the same embargoes exist to-day that existed on the day that the Garfield order was promulgated. This is borne out in the papers this morning by Mr. Hoover. Cereal exports to the allies, he says, will be 45,000,000 bushels short by the end of February. The meat shipments are also short and far below the amounts promised. The corn crop is in danger because of lack of transportation; potatoes are spoiling in the producers' hands, and a menacing situation in all foodstuffs is before us, only because the railroads have fallen down.

Are we now to add to these difficulties by dividing the responsibility and take power from the Chief Executive, who has the matter in his hands, because of a sentimental or an individual business reason?

I am frank to say I believe the rates will be increased, whether by the Interstate Commerce Commission or by the President. I believe, too, that the President should be unhampered in his control and upheld in his efforts, the sincerity of which no one questions, to carry forward in unison the mighty and necessary volume of business the war has put upon us, in order that victory may not be unnecessarily delayed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President, having in time of war taken over the possession, use, control, and operation (called herein Federal control) of certain railroads and systems of transportation (called herein carriers), is hereby authorized to agree with and to guarantee to any such carrier making operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission, that during the period of such Federal control it shall receive as just compensation not exceeding an annual sum (herein called standard return) payable from time to time in reasonable installments, for each year and pro rata for any fractional year of such Federal control, equivalent as nearly as may be to its average annual railway operating income (including therein such income of lines acquired by, leased to, or consolidated with such carrier between July 1, 1914, and December 31, 1917) for the three years ended June 30, 1917, and in addition thereto an annual sum payable, likewise in reasonable installments reckoned at a rate per cent to be fixed by the President upon the cost of any additions or betterments, less retirements or road extensions, made during the six months ended December 31, 1917; that any railway operating income accruing during the period of Federal control in excess of such standard return shall remain the property of the United States; and that each carrier so agreeing shall thereby become subject to all the provisions of this act. In the computation of such income, debits and credits arising from the accounts called in the monthly reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission equipment rents and joint facility rents shall be included. The standard return and the cost of such additions, betterments, or road extensions are to be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission from the reports, books, and other pertinent data of such carrier and certified by it to the President. Its certificate shall, for the purpose of such agreement, be taken as conclusive of the amount of such average annual railway operating income and of such cost.

Every such agreement shall provide that any Federal taxes under the act of October 3, 1917, or acts in addition thereto or in amendment thereof, commonly called war taxes, assessed for the period of Federal control beginning January 1, 1918, or any part of such period, shall be paid by the carrier out of its own funds, or shall be charged against or deducted from the standard return; that other taxes assessed under Federal or any other governmental authority for the period of Federal control or any part thereof, either on the property used under such Federal control or on the right to operate as a carrier, or on the revenues or any part thereof derived from operation (not including, however, assessments for public improvements or taxes assessed on property under construction, and chargeable under the classification of the Interstate Commerce Commission to investment in road and equipment), shall be paid out of revenues derived from railway operations while under Federal control; that all taxes assessed under Federal or any other governmental authority for the period prior to January 1, 1918, whenever levied or payable, shall be paid by the carrier out of its own funds, or shall be charged against or deducted from the standard return.

Every such agreement shall also contain adequate and appropriate provisions for the maintenance, repair, renewals, and depreciation of the property, for the creation of any reserves or reserve funds found necessary in connection therewith, and for such accounting and adjustments of charges and payments, both during and at the end of Federal control, as may be requisite in order that the property of each carrier may be returned to it in substantially as good repair and in substantially as complete equipment as it was in at the beginning of Federal control, and also that the United States may, by deductions from the standard return or by other proper means and charges, be reimbursed for the cost of any additions, repairs, renewals, and betterments to such property not justly chargeable to the United States; in making such accounting and adjustments due consideration shall be given to the amounts expended or reserved by each carrier for maintenance, repairs, renewals, and depreciation during the three years ended June 30, 1917, to the condition of the property at the beginning and at the end of Federal control and to any other pertinent facts and circumstances.

The President is further authorized in such agreement to make all other reasonable provisions not inconsistent with the provisions of this act or of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916, that he may deem necessary or proper for such Federal control or for the determination of the mutual rights and obligations of the parties to the agreement arising from or out of such Federal control.

If the President shall find that the condition of any carrier was during all or a substantial portion of the period of three years ended June 30, 1917, because of nonoperation, receivership, or any undeveloped or abnormal conditions, so exceptional as to make the basis of earnings hereinabove provided for plainly inequitable as a fair measure of just compensation, then the President may make with the carrier such agreement for such amount as just compensation as under the circumstances of the particular case he shall find just.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is this bill being read by paragraphs or by sections?

The CHAIRMAN. By sections.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ESCH: Amend section 1 by adding thereto, page 5, line 19, the following:

"Provided further, That every railroad not under control or operated by another carrier company and which has heretofore competed for traffic with a railroad or railroads of which the President has taken possession, use, and control shall be held and considered as within Federal control as herein defined, and shall be entitled to the benefit of all the provisions of this act."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I think this might be made a separate paragraph and the words "Provided further" might be stricken out. I will ask for that later.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce believed that some consideration should be given to the short-line carriers. We were persuaded, as a result of two days of testimony by the representatives of such carriers, that some protection should be given to them during the period of Federal control. Therefore we inserted paragraph 9 of the bill, which gives them this degree of protection, namely, that their routing instructions and their traffic arrangements shall continue to be recognized during the period of Federal control, subject, however, to the superior rights of the Government in the shipment of war supplies and materials.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Certainly.

Mr. SNOOK. Is this the same amendment as that adopted by the Senate?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; identically. And the compensation which the Government is to make to the short-line carrier because of routing war materials and supplies is provided by the Government, so far as possible, distributing to these short-line carriers so much of unrouted freight as possible.

After more careful consideration of our House bill section 9, I have come to the conclusion that it does not give any substantial relief to the short-line carriers, and that if we would do exact justice to them we should put them in the same position as trunk-line carriers.

It is stated in the newspapers that—

With the approval of President Wilson the Federal Railroad Administration is about to interest itself in street railway, light and heat, and power companies throughout the country, whose finances may be threatened by mounting costs of operation. Where it appears necessary increase in fares or rates may be suggested.

It is essential that these utilities should be maintained at their maximum efficiency and that everything reasonably possible should be done with that end in view.

If it is intended that the Federal Government shall interest itself in all these public utilities, street cars, gas companies, and electric light companies, in order to stabilize the financial standing thereof, is it not equally necessary that he should also stabilize the financial standing of the short-line carriers? They can not operate under war control with the powers exercised by the Director General and live, because the Director General claims the right of routing the freight, and if he routes the freight, the short-line carrier, being deprived of its freight, can not for the action of the Government of the United States, by must live upon the traffic it receives from the trunk line or the traffic it ships out on its own line to the trunk-line carrier, and on that account our provision of section 9 will not be a sufficient safeguard to these small carriers. They would doubtless live as they have lived heretofore had it not been for the war emergency.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his testimony before our committee, when he was asked whether he would take over the short-line carriers, said that he did not wish to take cripples any more than the War Department would enlist cripples for the conduct of the war. By "cripples" he meant that many of these short-line carriers were in financial straits or not paying dividends. But I wish to call attention to this pertinent fact: We would not make the short-line carrier a cripple if it were not, for the action of the Government of the United States, by reason of routing the freight over the trunk-line carriers.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I wanted to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is recognized for four minutes more. Does he yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. In the consideration of this short-line question two things have been in my mind all the time, and two fears have come up with reference to it. One has been that if we take all of the short lines of the country it would probably make a charge upon us that would be staggering. The other has been that if we did not take them it would mean practical murder to them. Now, some Senator told me that an argument was made at the other end of the Capitol yesterday in which it was claimed that the short lines, taken all in all—not the little logging roads and things of that kind that in all probability would not be taken under the gentleman's amendment—were as self-sustaining and probably more so than the trunk lines. Does the gentleman have any facts on that, or any opinion as to that?

Mr. ESCH. If they are taken over they will be in no worse condition than they were prior to the taking over. So it would not be a burden on the Treasury of the United States. The fact is that we are putting them in a worse state than they were before war control began, and they are put in that condition through no cause of their own, but because of the exigencies of war. But I wish to say this, that if we are to stabilize the securities of carriers, we may well look to the stabilizing of the securities of the short lines, covering 30,000 miles in length, with $1,200,000,000 of capitalization and $800,000,000 bonds outstanding. Unless we stabilize them, their securities will depreciate in the market, and if they do we might have some bankruptcies and some receiverships, all of which would still further embarrass the credit of the Government.

Mr. RAYBURN. That has been my idea, about what would probably be the fate of the short lines if something more was not done to them than we have done by section 9 in this bill.

Mr. ESCH. Is the gentleman convinced——

Mr. RAYBURN. But what I wanted the gentleman's opinion on, and the facts in his possession if any, was as to what are we going to do for the short lines except take them over if his amendment is adopted? Are we going to insure them something, or do we intend to take them over and insure them only what they have been getting?

Mr. ESCH. I think that would be entirely within the discretion of the President under the agreement provided in section 1.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I yield to my colleague.
